Hostage to be freed today, say captors

American Joseph Cicippio is expected to be released at 3 a.m.

By the Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A Shiite Muslim group said it would release American hostage Joseph Cicippio Monday, and the United Nations reported important progress in freeing the remaining Western hostages.

The Revolutionary Justice Organization, in a statement delivered before dawn to a Western news agency and the independent Beirut newspaper an-Nahar, said it would free Cicippio at 11 a.m.

The statement was authenticated by a photograph and a videotape of Cicippio, 61, of Norristown, Pa., who was acting comptroller of the American University of Beirut when he was abducted Sept. 12, 1986.

"The Revolutionary Justice Organization announces that it will free the American Joseph Cicippio at 11 a.m. at the Beau Rivage Hotel," the nine-line Arabic statement said.

The statement said U.N., Syrian and Iranian officials should come to the hotel to take delivery of the educator.

The group has delivered similar invitations to attend hostage releases at the Beau Rivage only to free the captive in Syria while dozens of reporters and cameramen waited at the hotel.

The statement said the organization had received reassuring guarantees about future moves by the United Nations to gain the release of Arab prisoners held in Israel, Israel's self-styled security zone in southern Lebanon and in Europe.

The United Nations has been seeking to arrange a comprehensive swap of Western hostages and the hundreds of Arab detainees.

HOSTAGES IN THE MIDDLE EAST

- A Shiite Muslim group promised the release of American hostage Joseph Cicippio this morning after more than five years in captivity.
- The announcement followed the release Sunday of 25 Arab detainees by Israel's allied militia in southern Lebanon, a key demand of the kidnappers.

Space Shuttle lands safely

Failed navigational unit is the cause of shortened Atlantis flight

By the Associated Press

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Space shuttle Atlantis sailed through an overcast desert sky and returned home with six astronauts Sunday, ending a military mission cut short by a failed navigational unit.

Atlantis landed on the dry lakebed at 2:35 p.m. The ship's arrival was heralded by its customary twin sonic booms.

"Welcome home Atlantis and congratulations on a great flight," Mission Control's Bob Cabana told shuttle commander Frederick Gregory after the orbiter rolled to a stop.

Atlantis circled the world 109 times and logged 2.9 million miles during the journey, which began a week ago. The shuttle successfully deployed a $300 million satellite a week ago to provide early warning of enemy missile attacks, space launches and nuclear explosions.

The astronauts were in excellent health after their flight and planned to stay in California overnight before returning home to Houston on Monday, said Steve Nagel, acting chief of NASA's astronaut office.

The shuttle's condition looked good with few dings on the tiles that protect it from the heat of re-entry, he added.

Because of the prospect of high winds, NASA decided to skip the shuttle's first landing opportunity, which was 1 1/2 hours, or one orbit, earlier than the actual touchdown. "As it turned out, they could have landed on the first opportunity," Nagel said.

NASA shortened the mission by three days after a navigational unit failed Saturday. Nagel said the spaceship's two other guidance units worked fine during re-entry and the crew was never in any danger.

Schools teach students ecology

Students learn the importance of recycling as a way to preserve the planet

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan area schools have added an "E" to the three "Rs" — reading, 'riting, 'rithmetic and environment.

Increased environmental awareness has lead some Manhattan schools to begin teaching students at all grade levels ways to protect and preserve the Earth.

Almost all area schools practice some form of environmental awareness, whether it be including environmental issues in the curriculum or encouraging students to recycle paper and aluminum cans in special containers throughout the school.

"It's important to raise awareness now while they're young, so they can change their lifestyles in the future," Tish Simpson, ecology teacher at Manhattan High School said.

Simpson teaches a special recycling unit in her ecology class. Her students learn what recycling is, what to recycle, places to take materials and how long it takes for waste to disintegrate.

The class is an indoor-outdoor class.

For the first half of class, students are outside learning about the environment; during the rest of the time, they learn in the classroom about the social issues affecting the Earth, Simpson said.

Simpson buries everyday scraps at the beginning of the semester to show how long it takes materials to disintegrate in nature.

"I bury scraps like plastic bags, packages made of recycled paper vs. virgin paper, natural fibers vs. man-made and miscellaneous items," Simpson said. "After three months we dig it up to see how much has disintegrated. Usually things haven't done much, so they get the idea."

Another school heightening its environmental awareness is Amanda Arnold Elementary School.

Prompted by an environmental group formed by fourth graders, students recently had an aluminum-can drive and a lemonade stand during parent/teacher conferences. Proceeds from the drive went to purchase a Red Panda for the Sunset Zoo.

The panda is on the endangered species list, Lisa Bietau, fourth grade teacher at Amanda Arnold said.

"The kids chose to buy the Red Panda because our school mascot is Amanda the Panda," Bietau said. "Since the panda is on the endangered species list, this was one way the kids felt they could help with animal conservation."

Flint Hills Job Corp Center to open in January

Program helps teach skills to needy youth

MICHELLE POULIN
Collegian Reporter

Twenty years ago, former presidents John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson established a program that thrives to this day and soon will become a large part of the Manhattan area.

During the 1960s, several programs were implemented to help America's poor. Only two of these programs still exist: the Peace Corps and the Job Corps.

January 1992 will mark the opening of the Flint Hills Job Corps Center three miles west of Manhattan on state Highway 18.

The Job Corps is housed in and around the Old Manhattan Beach Resort area. Over $1 billion has been spent to renovate the building up to modern standards as well as build several new ones.

Center Director Dave Maranville said the Job Corps is designed to aid low-income families in Kansas by giving them an opportunity to learn a technical trade.

The center is set up to teach 250 students a vocational trade such as carpentry, clerical training, culinary art training and health occupational training. The programs last anywhere from six months to two years.

Jim Purgason, senior project manager from the U.S. Department of Labor, said, "We have certain restrictions we follow. We only take kids ages 16-22, and they must meet the government-set poverty standards. Only then can an application for admittance be filed."

Applicants will go through their local job centers, which recommend them for admittance. Because space is limited, all applicants go through screenings and tests.

If accepted into the program, the individual is guaranteed certain benefits.

"The program is literally at no cost to the youth. We are funded by the state and federal government

Ukrainians may secede

Independence sought to express nationalist desires

By the Associated Press

KIEV, U.S.S.R. — Brimming with hope, Ukrainians voted Sunday in a referendum on independence that could deal the fatal blow to Mikhail Gorbachev's disintegrating Soviet Union.

All six candidates in an accompanying presidential election, including front-runner Leonid Kravchuk, have said the referendum will lead to full independence for the Ukraine and pledged not to sign Gorbachev's Union Treaty.

That appears to mean the Ukraine will break completely from Gorbachev's central Soviet government, unlike a few other republics which declared independence but signed the treaty.

But it was not clear whether the Ukraine could legally secede from the Soviet Union without recognition by the national legislature or Gorbachev, the Soviet president.

And there would be formidable logistical challenges to independence: the republic would have to set up its own border posts, enact its own citizenship laws and complete talks on removal of an estimated 1.2 million Soviet soldiers. The Ukraine's Parliament already has voted to create its own army and currency.

Irina Uspenskaya, 60, a retired economist and ethnic Russian, acknowledged the difficulties but said, "I'm voting for my grandsons. For me, I don't think anything is going to change soon, but for them, yes, I want independence."

Early turnout was reported at 75.6 percent. Preliminary results from the voting were not expected until Monday afternoon but pre-election polls indicated the Ukraine's 37.5 million voters were 3-1 in favor of independence because of nationalism and economic discontent.

Voters said Gorbachev had failed to raise their living standard and Student Senate intern positions open

Now that elected positions have been filled, students who lost an election or are just interested in student government can apply for intern or committee positions.

This year, the senate race was especially tough. There were 41 students, for example, who ran for 18 arts and science positions. In the college of business, 19 students ran for eight positions.

"There are many ways to get involved in student government besides just being elected to a position," said Ann Woodbury, junior in business and former Senate parliamentarian and elections chair.

There are five committee chair positions and at-large membership positions available: academic affairs, finance, University relations, student affairs and social services, legislative affairs, senate operations, and communications.

There are also 18 Senate intern positions available. The terms will run until April 1992.

"It's a way of getting involved to see what you might be getting into if you are considering Senate, and it's a good way to learn the ropes of how to be a senator," said Pete Marsh, former Senate chair.

Tricia Thornton, arts and science senator and legislative affairs chair, said committees are a good way of getting involved without having to give as much time as it takes to be a senator.

Committee work takes only about one hour a week, she said.

Doo Dah Day Parade zippity success

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) — Cloggers wielding toilet plungers danced on tortilla-strewn pavement, and followers of the Church of the Ornamental Lawn Decorations marched with pink flamingo hats in Sunday's Doo Dah Parade.

Toilet paper rolls plummeted amid the "Rocky Horror Picture Show" dancers as the offbeat parade went on for a 16th year, even though it has billed itself each year as "occasional."

Roller skaters dressed as policemen re-enacted the videotaped beating of Rodney King by Los Angeles officers. "M.C. Pee-wee and His Scandalous Posse," a lookalike with two gyrating women dancers, targeted Pee-wee Herman in jest for his run-in with the law in Florida.

The parade originated as an off-the-cuff spoof of the annual New Year's Day Tournament of Roses, but has evolved into a local institution.

Thousands lined the streets to watch a disjointed stream of parade entries ranging from the Bagpeople's Bagpipe Band to the Supreme Court Justices In Training, who spent a lot of time lifting their robes.

Participants and onlookers kept a Doo Dah tradition alive by raining on the parade with tortillas, flinging the flat, round Mexican bread like Frisbees.

A group called "COLD," the Church of Ornamental Lawn Decorations, celebrated the pink flamingo. Actress Elizabeth Taylor's recent wedding was lampooned, featuring a photographer in a parachute.

Other marchers included the PMS Brigade and the Claude Rains Memorial 20-Man Invisible Marching Drill Team. Plays on words, like that offered by the Conejo Valley Cloggers, weren't uncommon.

"Clogging is not a plumbing problem," the group declared, demonstrating the old American dance form and their point, with the help of plungers.

The first Doo Dah Parade was held Jan. 1, 1978, when the Rose Parade was switched to Jan. 2 to avoid being on a Sunday.

Murderer escapes from prison

BALTIMORE (AP) — A convicted murderer serving a life sentence escaped from his cell by fleeing along prison rooftops before dropping to the ground using a rope made of cloth. He remained at large Sunday.

Harold Dean, 40, broke out through an 8-inch by 14-inch window at the downtown Maryland Correctional Adjustment Center on Saturday afternoon, said Gregory Shipley, a state prisons spokesman.

It was the first escape from Maryland's top-security lockup, nicknamed Supermax, which was designed for problem prisoners.

Dean maneuvered through rolls of razor-sharp barbed wire on the roof, using blankets or a jacket to pad his way. The breakout was discovered, perhaps as long as an hour after it happened, when a guard noticed cloth fragments on the wire.

The prisoner used a jury-rigged rope made of cloth to lower himself 15 feet to the ground. A trail of blood indicated he cut himself on the wire despite the cloth padding.

Dean was serving a life sentence plus 105 years for murder, armed robbery and assault. He robbed a courier and wounded an armored-car guard in 1981 before killing a tow-truck driver who chased the getaway car.

He broke his foot in a failed escape attempt from the Maryland Penitentiary in 1985 and was one of the first inmates transferred to the downtown prison after it opened in 1989.

Supermax houses 280 of Maryland's most dangerous criminals who were sent there because of escape attempts or other disciplinary problems.

Hunt for Chinese sub on in Pacific

HONG KONG (AP) — A Communist Chinese submarine has disappeared in the Yellow Sea and People's Liberation Army ships and helicopters have launched a search, sources and press reports say.

The conventional Romeo-class submarine, belonging to the North China Sea Fleet, left the Chinese port of Qingdao about two weeks ago on a mission in the Yellow Sea, northeast of Taiwan, Western sources said, speaking on condition of anonymity. It disappeared shortly thereafter, the sources said.

They added they were unaware how many crew members were on board.

Hong Kong and Taiwan newspapers said Chinese helicopters and ships were searching for the submarine, a medium-range, conventionally-powered craft armed with conventional torpedoes.

Taiwan's Central Daily News, quoting unidentified officials from Taiwan's Defense Ministry, reported Thursday that Taiwanese intelligence began tracking the submarine soon after it left Qingdao.

Michies describe Peace Corps

1966 drought made Barry Michie's assignment difficult

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

The land known as the "Place of the Kings" had one physician for every 100,000 people.

Barry Michie, assistant professor in political science, served in the United States Peace Corps in Rajasthan, India from 1966-68.

"I remember getting off the plane in Delhi and being scared to death," he said.

During his two-year-and-nine-month service in the Peace Corps, Barry worked in the town of Malpura in a primary health center.

Right out of college with a degree in political science, Barry was assigned to a public health project in rural India.

His home in India caused questions from the local townspeople.

"They asked me if I heard strange sounds at night," he said. "I subsequently found out I was being housed in the morgue."

He was moved to other housing after a month.

It was a difficult time to be in India in 1966, he said.

He arrived during a drought and worked with a doctor doing village visits.

He adjusted to the food, to speaking Hindi and to the two-bucket-a-day water rations during the drought. Barry hasn't, though, forgotten his worst experience in the Peace Corps.

He found out that a poor farm family had committed female infanticide when they couldn't feed both of the newborn twins they had.

"The mother delivered a boy and a girl, but they didn't give water or food to the female child," he said.

He didn't find out about the child, however, until it was too late.

Some of the 25 Peace Corps workers assigned with Barry had a hard time adjusting to the situation in India, he said. Some went home early; others had problems completing their assignment.

"Some volunteers retreated into their houses and hardly ever stepped outside," he said.

"One of the difficult things in a cross-cultural situation is if you don't understand the language you really feel lost.

"Learning to develop those language skills was something that I really put top priority on," he said.

SHANE KEYSER/Staff

As a Peace Corps associate director in India in 1966, Aruna Michie supervised volunteer Barry Michie. They later married. Both are political science professors at K-State and share an office in Kedzie Hall.

After spending a year and nine months working with the employees of the health center, Barry decided he wanted to be involved in a project dealing more directly with public health education and community development.

So he extended his stay nine months and worked with a local artisan to design a mold for sanitary latrines.

The mold was used to form a concrete fitting for a water-sealed, trapdoor latrine.

"The sanitary latrines would help prevent the spread of disease by preventing food and water contamination," he said.

Before he left, he built several of the latrines and promoted the building of others in the Malpura

Despite the hardships, Barry said he really enjoyed his time in India.

"India is a place that I can understand and work in," he said.

Michie met and married his wife Aruna, associate professor of political science, during his Peace Corps service and left India in 1968 bound for graduate school.

Work in corps provided grass-roots experience, says Aruna Michie

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Aruna Michie, associate professor of political science, shares an office today with her husband Barry Michie, assistant professor of political science, but in 1966, she was his boss.

The two met in India when they both worked for the Peace Corps — Aruna as an associate director and Barry as an American volunteer.

"I had finished my undergraduate work in political science in the United States and came home to India to work," Aruna said.

At a dinner party in India with her parents, she was introduced to Peace Corps officials and asked if she would like to help with a new Peace Corps training program.

"There were more than 2,000 volunteers in India. It was the largest program going at the time," she said.

"This was going to be the first group trained in the country instead of in the United States."

Her fluency in Hindi and English helped Aruna in training the new volunteers.

Aruna was soon promoted to the position of associate director in charge of 62 Peace Corps volunteers in the state of Rajasthan.

"Looking back, I don't think anybody today would give me the chance that I had then to go out and take that much responsibility with a bachelor of arts degree in political science," she said.

Aruna's responsibilities included supervising the volunteers, working with the government to write new project proposals and making sure the training programs were compatible with the goals of the projects.

"It gave me grass-roots experience that no college or university could

Letter provides truth about war

Former K-Stater appeals for help in ending conflict

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Angela Lambley remembers the summer evenings she and Goran Tonkovic would go to Espresso Royale Cafe for lemonade and conversation. They talked mostly about their families, she said.

Tonkovic was a graduate student in agronomy but left K-State to go home to Yugoslavia. Lambley said she had not heard from him since then until she received a letter last week.

She met Tonkovic the summer of 1990 when they both were living in Goodnow Hall. She remembered him as a calm man who liked the Rolling Stones.

"I remember he didn't like the weather in Kansas," she said. "He thought it was too cold."

Lambley, sophomore in microbiology, said she was surprised to receive a letter from him because even though the two had exchanged addresses, they had never corresponded.

"I put off writing him for quite a while," she said. "When I finally got around to it, the war had started (in Yugoslavia), and I figured he wouldn't get the letter."

What surprised Lambley even more then receiving the letter were its contents.

The letter was not light and friendly, but serious. He briefly described the war in Yugoslavia and then appealed for help to stop the war.

"Many people do not know what is going on over here, what terrible things are happening to my people," Tonkovic wrote. "Therefore, I send a message to you. I send the truth to you. Please, tell the truth to your friends. Help to stop the war in Croatia."

Lambley said she doesn't understand the hatred toward Serbia Tonkovic expressed in his letter.

"He used to tell me the only difference between a Croat and a Serb were the two words and a language," she said.

"I'm wondering what has happened between now and then to change his mind," she said, "because in the letter, he wasn't too happy with the Serbs."

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said the basis for the war between the Serbs and Croats is the Serbs do not want their people living in Croatia.

"The idea is that the Serbs would enlarge their republic as much as possible," he said.

Hajda said the Croatian cry for help to stop the war has gone unnoticed in the United States.

"The United States has not shown any strong desire to get involved," he said.

He said he was not sure of the reason behind this hesitancy. Some nations in Europe are trying to find a peaceful solution, but the United States has taken a hands-off stance.

"The United States should have been at the forefront of the effort to seek a peaceful solution through the United Nations," he said.

Lambley agreed. She said she would like to see the United States stop trading with Yugoslavia or send United Nations peacekeeping forces to stop the fighting.

Lambley said she was not sure if it would be safe to write him back.

"I'm going to call the State Department first, and if they think it will be all right and he won't get hurt because of the letter, then I'll write him back," she said.

It took Galileo 16 years to master the universe. You have one night.

It seems unfair. The genius had all that time. While you have a few short hours to learn your sun spots from your satellites before the dreaded astronomy exam.

On the other hand, Vivarin gives you the definite advantage. It helps keep you awake and mentally alert for hours. Safely and conveniently. So even when the subject matter's dull, your mind will stay razor sharp.

If Galileo had used Vivarin, maybe he could have mastered the solar system faster, too.

AIDS

Day Without Art reminder there is no day without AIDS

Now is the time for all good people to come to the aid of their humanity.

The lights dimmed in Austin, Texas, Sunday night at about the same time this editorial was being written. They went out in Chicago, Miami, New York and San Francisco, too. Some museums removed paintings from their walls. Candlelight vigils went on throughout the night across the nation, and art galleries distributed red ribbons to their patrons.

Sunday, you see, was the third annual Day Without Art, a part of the World Health Organization's World AIDS Day. The AIDS quilt with the names of those who have died from the disease was on display in Wichita to coincide with the event, and there are a lot of people trying to raise enough money to bring it to Manhattan in February.

In the Nov. 29 issue of Entertainment Weekly, there's a three-page photo essay on the at least 67 people who've died from AIDS in the entertainment industry this year.

"Some of the names and faces here may not be familiar," the authors wrote. "But in a world without AIDS, they might someday have been."

They aren't all Magic Johnsons or Freddie Mercurys or Keith Harings. They hadn't all had roles in movies like "The Fisher King" or written for publications like the Village Voice and Vanity Fair.

In fact, some of the more than 14,428 people who died from AIDS this year — two-thirds the number of people who go to K-State — were people we knew personally. They were our brothers, sisters, friends and lovers.

It's tough to discuss AIDS without half of your audience turning you off because they think "The only people who get AIDS are queers and druggies." And, some will pound on their Bible like Thumper the bunny and quote God saying "This is the Word of the Lord this is." If only those people understood the whole as well as they did the parts.

We will have to deal with AIDS for the rest of our lives — when we go to a bar and ask that pretty young woman or handsome young man if we can buy her or him a drink, when we see the condom machine in the bathroom of a gas station out on K-177.

It's been reported that someone dies from AIDS every eight minutes. In the time it takes you to walk across campus, two people will have died from the disease.

On Tecumseh Road, not four blocks west of campus, is the Riley County Health Department. The people there give AIDS tests every day to all kinds of people in a very simple and very confidential, professional manner.

You go to the counter, tell them you'd like to have an AIDS test, and they tell you to have a seat with no questions asked. After a short wait, they take your blood, assign you a number and tell you to call in a week for the results.

They never ask your name. They don't judge you. They don't ask you for any identification.

Too many people have been lost to AIDS. Too many people have spread the disease unknowingly. Too many people's names are on the AIDS quilt. If you think you might be at risk, find out. If our heroes can face the disease, then we should, too.

Places on the way to someplace far away

ED SKOOG

Highway 24 dotted with pleasant prairie sights

1 December 1991

Highway 24 rides the Newman terrace of the Kaw River valley between Topeka and Manhattan. This sets the road 15 feet above the flood plain. The terrace is shared with the towns of Silver Lake, Rossville, St. Marys, Belvue and Wamego. Highway 24 crosses the Vermillion and Big Blue rivers. To the north lie the Flint Hills, and to the south is the Kansas River.

If you make the drive between Topeka and Manhattan often, you probably take I-70 to exit 313, then descend into the valley on K-177, as if concluding a lame roller-coaster ride. This kind of descent makes you hate Manhattan before you even cross the bridge, before you see the grain elevator and the one-story mall.

My advice — take Highway 24 next time.

26 November 1991

Every Skoog is in Topeka — all my brothers, parents, grandparents, nieces and nephews, all of them Skoogs. I drive through the Manhattan Industrial Park, past the Plainsman, past the McCall Pattern Company and onto 24.

Manhattan's true city limit is the Big Blue River. It meets the Kaw one half of a mile south of the bridge. Past it, the Ranch Saloon, a sale barn and then a drive into the hills before Wamego, city of windmills and Dyers IGA and birthplace of Walter P. Chrysler.

I hate the stoplight in Wamego, the turnoff to Highway 99. You'd never stop between Topeka and Manhattan if not for the light. Next I pass the Kreem Kup, where two friends from back east and I ate milkshakes after a wild weekend last summer in Manhattan. On the left, a John Deere distributor. "Nothing runs like a Deere."

A fruit market (closed) marks the midpoint between Wamego and Belvue.

Belvue is the name of a mental hospital in New York. I can never forget this when driving through. On the left is the "?" — a resale shop, according to the sign on the front door. I know from an old newspaper that this is where the Belvue Pope celebrates mass. One thinks of the Avignon papacy, the great schism ... but this is Kansas, so, you wanna be the Pope? You're the pope. Duck on your way out the door.

At night, all the lights go out in Belvue. I never stop. Does anyone live here?

Later, just before Rossville, 20 miles from Topeka, I pull over. A flock of snow geese is sprawling into a field. There's a John Updike poem in which he calls a flock of starlings above a golf course a "scarf of birds."

That's what this looks like — a scarf of geese above the river, winding down. Two hunters walk toward the road, broken-down shotguns over right shoulders, geese in left hands, swinging by necks. I get out of the car. Another flock is coming in from over Rossville.

Now, I know it is bad policy to look up at a flock of any variety of birds, let alone large waterfowl, but the moment is holy. The sun inches toward the horizon, dripping out of a dark cloud. I am sweating and wearing a coat. Trucks roll by (whup, whup, whup), their tailwinds almost visible in the declining light. I look up, and the geese squawk as they go over, only 100 feet off the ground. It sounds as if a pack of dogs is chasing down a fox. The flocks merge, fly on to another field. I turn my Malibu toward the highway and drive softer home.

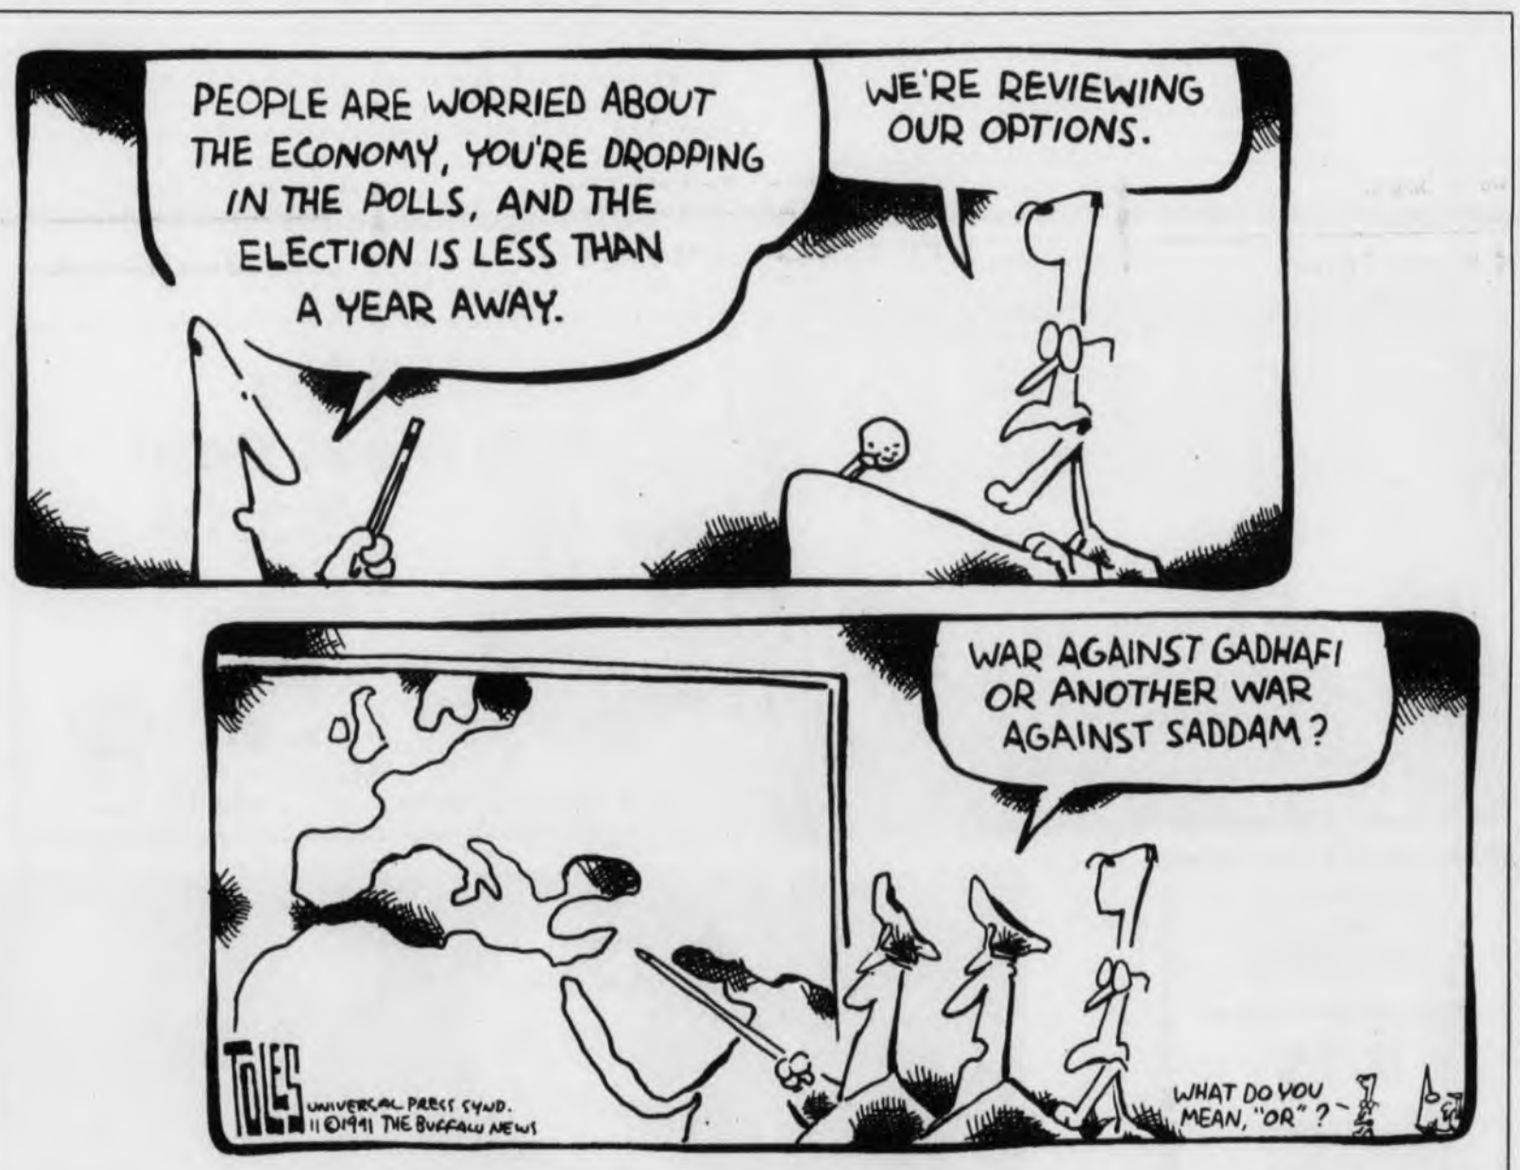
Haven't studied for days; almost forgot about school; would like to forget. Everything out of balance and perspective, decaying: failing classes, rejected for an escapist fellowship at fancy-schmancy Pennsylvania school, thereby losing any chance for good spring fly-fishing. Then, another panic attack yesterday that I thought was a heart attack. All I can see for next semester is studying Milton and Anatomy in my cold apartment with rock 'n' roll, drunk roommates and a loud refrigerator.

Back on 24, past the Topeka Goodyear Plant where all my grade school pals' fathers worked. Then a straight shot into Silver Lake, home of Howard, now in Yugoslavia, I hear, to preach Bah'ai wisdom, same deal as when he went to Guyana a few years ago. Such weird international people growing up in a town with a Nazi cop who sits with radar gun in the 20-mph zone. Silver Lake, State Football Champs 1991 (Class 3A) and home of Lon Kruger. Kruger and Sons' shop is down the street from the Smorgasbord and the one-room public library.

Pass Silver Lake (the lake itself is almost dried up. Every summer the lake disappears, leaving corpses of catfish and carp to rot. The smell drifts to Topeka on bad days.). Now, across the state a few more miles, west and almost to St. Marys.



The old catholic seminary and cathedral are on the side of the hill. The Lefebreves' Catholic post-Vatican II splinter group is restoring the burned-down cathedral. There is a temporary prefab red steeple. St. Marys is best known for having a military surplus shop downtown. Jesus and military surplus — a winning combo. St. Marys is a destination in itself, when I need a new sleeping bag or a knife.

I'm listening to a Roger Miller tape, the song "England Swings," in fact, as I swing into the parking lot of the convenience mart down the hill from the cathedral.

Convenience marts and televisions have destroyed the sense of time and distance in modern society, according to a communist, hippie, homosexual millionaire in San Francisco that a pal of mine worked for this summer. To escape this dead environment, many people our age have fled to Europe or Alaska.

But here, in the city of the Madonna, drinking coffee out of Styrofoam, time and distance mean everything. I am halfway between home and school, and after graduation I will go someplace else, far away. But I know that time stands between these events like a forest, and that worry is a blunt tool.

I drive the rest of the way to Manhattan in a sort of Kansas trance.

Licorice, candy bars & condoms?

Editor,

Isn't it nice to know that along with a Baby Ruth and some Twizzlers, anyone can purchase his or her very own condom? I'm all for sexual responsibility, but what does it mean when accessibility is as easy as buying a candy bar?

Magic Johnson preaches safe sex. (It's interesting that he's considered to be a "victim" of AIDS while gays have too often been blamed for their conditions.) The purpose of his message is good, but it echoes a growing assumption in our society that having casual sex is the acceptable and expected thing to do.

This is really not about condoms or whether one should be "doing it." It's more about the sacredness and the seriousness of that choice now becoming reduced to a "sugar high," the hurt that casual choices often bring, and the deep desire we all possess to become whole people.

Abortion figures disagree

Editor,

It was with great interest that we read of Peggy Jarman's recent speaking engagement at K-State regarding the late-term abortions in which her employer, Dr. George Tiller, "specializes." Unfortunately, it has become apparent that the Collegian has adopted a policy of free advertising for abortionists through the auspices of its news reporting. Several statements attributed to Ms. Jarman would be laughable if not for the tragedy of the abortion holocaust.

Jarman claimed the number of third-trimester abortions ranges from six in 1988 to 24 so far this year. These figures are false, according to a former medical records employee of Dr. Tiller, Ms. Luhra Tivis. Ms. Tivis, apparently still a pro-abortion advocate, recently wrote a letter to the Wichita City Council in which she said that the number of late-term abortions performed each week averaged 10-20 per week and that a very high percentage of late-term abortions were done on healthy fetuses.

Moreover, we often hear from the likes of Jarman regarding the need for providing women with real choices. In the same breath, they do not hesitate to label Operation Rescue as "radical" for attempting to save those females who are part of the 1.6 million unborn children murdered each year. In terms of providing real choices, the Summer of Mercy helped inspire such programs as HopeNet, an organization dedicated to better serving those with crisis pregnancies through networking of pro-life organizations.

As a result, the lesson in Wichita for the pro-life community was strikingly clear: The Christian community cannot stand by as this holocaust continues. The Christian community at K-State has a moral imperative to help all those involved in the abortion equation make Jesus Christ their choice, instead of making choice their Christ.

Cats rout Cowboys in voting game, too

Editor,

A couple weeks ago, upon completion of the SGA elections, some people wrote in to complain about the poor voter turnout. But, as I found out this weekend, this turnout was actually good.

I was one of the few die-hard fans who went to the Oklahoma State game. And as I was walking down one of the sidewalks, I came across some copies of the Oklahoma State newspaper. I picked up one to compare this campus to ours. One of the articles reported that of 18,650 students on the Oklahoma State campus, only a mere 454 students voted in the Oklahoma State SGA elections. That's only 2.43 percent. I was shocked and could do nothing but laugh.

It just goes to show you that we indeed did have a pretty good turnout, and I think K-State voters should be applauded.

K-State active environmentally

University trains workers to dispose of cleaning products

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

K-State has taken active steps to ensure the cleaning products and pesticides it uses are environmentally safe.

Workers are trained in how to use and dispose products safely following Environmental Protection Agency guidelines, said Al Seely, custodial services manager.

Vickie Dewitt, training and safety manager, said most of the products K-State uses are household products.

"They just have a different name because they're manufactured at Kansas Correctional Institution," Dewitt said. "At KCI, they produce a scouring powder that's just like Comet that you would use in your home," she said.

For more concentrated cleaning products, Seely said, the biggest thing is following the manufacturer's label. Vendors are brought in to train employees on the proper use and disposal for these products.

Pouring excess cleaners down the drain is not the correct disposal method, he said.

The majority of products K-State purchases are state contracted with KCI, Dewitt said. The University has to gain permission from the state to purchase products other than those from KCI. Before new products can be purchased, they must be approved by Seely, Dewitt said.

"Pesticides are rigidly controlled by the Department of Agriculture and also by federal EPA guidelines," Seely said. "Most of the time, chemical pesticides are used just to control insects, not to kill all of them."

Many of the rodent controls are physical barriers that do not harm the pest. Nets, screens and traps are used rather than chemicals to control birds, mice and other small animals, Seely said.

Periodically, facilities re-evaluates its products to ensure they use those that are best for the employees and environment.

"Anytime we find a product that does a better or equal job and is less dangerous to the employee or the environment and is available, we would choose that product," Dewitt said.

The students' environmental group has other ideas to help preserve the Earth. In vacant land behind their school, they want to help create an outdoor laboratory that would include a garden, compost pit and garbage pit, said Katie Kuhn, fourth-grader and co-leader of the group.

Bietau said students were willing to skip recess and work on projects outside of class time.

For the can drive, the students made posters, helped make ads for the parent newsletter and made special arrangements outside of class to set up a school account with Howie's Recycling.

Kuhn said, "Everyone says they want to do something about the Earth but don't do it. We aren't saying it — we're doing it."

suggested the industrial and agricultural powerhouse — dominated for centuries by Poles, Nazis, Russian czars and Soviets — would be more prosperous on its own.

"Independence is the only way out of the current situation. It's easier to put order into a small yard than a large yard," said Viktor Zakerpikny, 43, as he cast his ballot in Byelo Tserkov, 55 miles south of Kiev.

In Kiev, Mihailo Avanesov, 37, a metal artisan, said as he waited to vote: "If the center no longer takes a big slice of Ukraine's pie, we'll live fine."

The only early returns were from six Soviet military bases in Kiev, Odessa, Dnepropetrovsk and Donetsk.

Schools take class outside

Students to learn from life experience in science reform

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Three area schools, in conjunction with K-State and the National Science Foundation, are taking classrooms outdoors in a push to reform science education in the schools.

"There's a national emphasis to teach science as a life experience, rather than science as a collection of facts memorized as it has been in the past," said Gail Shroyer, associate director of the Center for Science Education.

With a grant from the National Science Foundation, K-State and Amanda Arnold, Lee and Woodrow Wilson elementary schools are in the process of setting up outdoor classrooms.

"The purpose of the outdoor classrooms is to allow students to conduct hands-on experiments outside in the environment instead of creating something in the classroom in an aquarium," said Melisa Hancock, fifth-grade teacher at Woodrow Wilson Elementary School.

These outdoor classrooms are to be set up on small portions of land near the schools. They will include gardens, compost pits and garbage gardens, said Lisa Bietau, fourth grade teacher from Amanda Arnold Elementary School.

Students will grow common plants in mini-gardens and conduct tests using acid rain, man-made and natural fertilizers, and different soils.

By creating compost pits, students can study how long it takes and what mixture is needed for leaves, branches and grass to naturally disintegrate.

The garbage garden will give students the opportunity to bury "so-called biodegradable products" and everyday waste to see how long it takes or if in fact they will disintegrate, Hancock said.

As part of a program under the National Science Foundation, students will collect samples of rain. The acidity of rain collected in Manhattan will be compared with rain around the world.

"The outdoor classroom is one of the more applicable practical earth sciences," Bietau said.

K-State guard Mary Jo Miller attempts to grab a loose ball from Creighton guard Becky Strathman during the Lady Cats' 77-57 loss Saturday afternoon in Bramlage Coliseum. The 0-2 Lady Cats' next game will be at home Tuesday evening against Oral Roberts University.

Quick start lifts Creighton past Lady Cats

Yow says time a factor in development

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

After an overtime road loss to open the season last Monday against Illinois-Chicago, the Lady Cats entered their home opener looking for cohesiveness against a tough Creighton team.

What K-State did, however, was come out flat as it trailed 18-4 six minutes into the game. The next four minutes were worse for the Lady Cats as the Lady Jays expanded their lead to 27-8. Creighton went on to post a 77-57 win to claim its first win of the season.

Creighton's victory came on the heels of a two-point loss at Nebraska and a 15-point loss to Wisconsin.

The Lady Cats fell to 0-2.

K-State coach Susan Yow credited the loss to a limited amount of practice time with her team, which includes seven newcomers.

"They got out to an early lead," Yow said. "We don't have a lot of chemistry right now. When we come down, we don't act like we know where our shots are going to come from. We played a very good team. I think Creighton is one of the best teams in the Midwest.

"We didn't show much talent out there, and our execution wasn't very good. The execution wasn't good at all. We played hard with a lot of tenacity as our 14 offensive rebounds would indicate, but at the same time, we had 27 turnovers and that's a lot to have."

Another area that needs immediate attention is the shooting. K-State made just 22 of 57 attempts from the field for 38.6 percent. Figure in six blocked shots, and the scene was R-rated for the Lady Cats.

"We can't go in the tank now," Yow said. "Experience can change

Respect for Big 8 football on the line in bowl games

SCOTT PASKE

And so it comes to this: If Nebraska beats Miami, Washington beats Michigan, the NCAA says the Orange Bowl and Rose Bowl are sanctioned events and voters have their heads screwed on right, the world will be a better place.

Hello, bowl season.

The Big Eight completed this year's postseason picture Friday when the Cornhuskers rallied for a 19-14 win over Oklahoma, a share of the league title and a trip to the Orange Bowl. The game didn't do a thing to decide who this year's national champion will be, but it determined the final obstacle for top-ranked and unbeaten Miami in its quest for a fourth crown on New Year's Day.

While the Hurricanes will try to prove that their shrinking lead over Washington in the Associated Press Top 25 Poll should have been growing, their opponent will be fighting for something that fans around these parts hoot and holler about every year — Big Eight respect.

Bowl games have been old hat for Nebraska and Oklahoma through the years, and it's becoming that way for Colorado, the league's other representative on this year's postseason slate. These teams have carried fans' hopes for a Big Eight national champion into the season's final day on several occasions, including the last two years, when the Buffaloes and Notre Dame met to settle the issue in the Orange Bowl.

This season, there won't be a national champion from the Big Eight. And if things don't go right, there won't be a league member in the top 10.

That's bad news for a league recognized around the country as a "football conference."

Parity was a welcome sight this year for Big Eight followers who have come to know the league as the Big Three and Little Five. Final conference standings would indicate that this season was no exception.

But try that theory on Colorado coach Bill McCartney, whose team beat K-State, KU, Oklahoma State and Iowa State by a combined total of 23 points.

Last year, the Buffs outscored the same four teams 174-47.

It makes you wonder if the bottom of the conference improved that much or if the cream of the crop sank toward the bottom.

Chances are, the answer is a little of both. That's great for fans in Manhattan, Lawrence, and Ames, Iowa, who have swallowed their tongues each time the upcoming opponent has been Nebraska or Oklahoma.

It's not for the three Big Eight bowl teams, though. All of them will enter their respective bowl games ranked lower than their opponents.

The Huskers' win over Oklahoma kept them in the No. 11 position, even though Florida State slipped two spots to fifth after a 14-9 loss to Florida. Because Nebraska will face the nation's No. 1 team, it certainly can do the most to turn the heads of those who've swept the Big Eight under the carpet this season.

The Huskers' biggest problem in previous Decembers and Januarys has been themselves. Florida State and Georgia Tech made the nation wonder if Nebraska even belonged in a bowl game in consecutive seasons. Many people think Miami will continue the string.

Colorado's fall from the nation's top spot was expected this season after the loss of 24 seniors, but painful nevertheless. The Buffs didn't lose a Big Eight game for the third straight season, but a tie with the Huskers and a lower ranking (No. 15) than Nebraska kept CU out of the Orange Bowl.

Colorado was forced to swallow its pride and cheer for the Sooners last week for a return trip. It didn't happen, but some of that pride can be regained if the Buffs can beat No. 8 Alabama in the Blockbuster Bowl on Dec. 28.

The Sooners won eight games for the second straight year to finish the regular season ranked 20th, one spot behind Gator Bowl opponent Virginia. But eight wins at Oklahoma isn't good enough.

It's definitely crunch time for Big Eight football.

Miners next test for Cats

Extended layoff gives Altman, squad time to improve

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Has K-State played a regular-season men's basketball game yet in 1991-92?

It's OK to ask that question since the one and only Cat contest came nine days ago and was an exhibition-like 103-65 rout of an overmatched Texas-San Antonio squad.

But, to be sure, that was a regular-season tilt, something Dana Altman's squad will become familiar with again tonight when it plays host to Missouri-Rolla in a 7:35 tip in Bramlage Coliseum.

Altman's squad used the layoff to polish all aspects of its game, the second-year coach said.

"We had a lot of things to work on," Altman said. "We had a few really good practices and some that weren't so good. But I'd characterize it as a good week overall."

Altman said he was concerned by a couple of things in the pair of practices in which the Cats were less than focused.

"I felt like our thought level and concentration were areas that we needed to improve on," Altman said of the team's mental game. "There were a couple of practices in there where we were kind of going through the motions."

K-State, though facing a Division I-AA opponent in Missouri-Rolla, will need to step it up a bit tonight, Altman said. The contest is the second of five straight home tilts the Cats will play at the outset of the new season.

The visiting Miners, 4-0, have captured wins in a pair of season-opening tournaments. They won the Kentucky Wesleyan Tipoff Tournament a week ago and grabbed the title at the Hall of Fame Classic this past weekend in Columbia, Mo.

The Miners are coached by Dale Martin and led on the floor by junior guard Bill Jolly, who averaged 18.6 points a game for the squad last season. Rolla was 14-13 a year ago, finishing with a league record of 4-12 in the Missouri Intercollegiate Athletic Association, a loop that contains Kansas-entrant Washburn among other schools.

K-State is coming off of the aforementioned thrashing of Texas-San Antonio. In that contest, the Cats had five players score in double figures.

Three of those players are expected to start tonight, including Ski Jones, who had a team-high 19 in the opener; Gaylon Nickerson, who had 15; and Vincent Jackson, who tossed in 13.

Providing firepower off the bench in the opener was Brian Henson, who had 11 points.

Another performer that Altman called from off the bench in exhibition tilts only to start in the opener was Trasel Rone, who had 15 points in the Texas-San Antonio game to match the output of Nickerson. Nickerson opened the contest on the bench.

K-State was torrid from the floor in the opener, shooting 59 percent. The 3-point shot was a definite weapon as well. The Cats drained 13-of-24 treys in the contest.

Trask reaches his goal

Women's team not so fortunate at NCAA event

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Todd Trask's lifelong dream was realized on the same day another dream ended for a group of K-State women's cross country runners.

For Trask, the leader of the Wildcat men's team, a 29th-place individual performance at the NCAA Cross Country Championships was good enough to earn him All-America status.

The senior from Healdsburg, Calif., covered the 10,000-meter course in Tucson, Ariz., on Nov. 25 in a time of 31 minutes, 15.8 seconds to become the second K-State runner in as many years to gain All-America status.

David Warders achieved that distinction in 1990. The first 25 American-born finishers in a national meet are awarded All-America status.

"Todd ran a really good race," said Wildcat coach John Capriotti. "He only had two guys from the district race beat him, and five guys got him there (in Wichita a week earlier)."

Capriotti said the key for Trask, who was unavailable for comment Sunday evening, was the way he approached the beginning of the race.

"It was a pretty tough course," Capriotti said of the layout at the El Conquistador Country Club near the campus of the University of Arizona. "But Todd ran a real smart race. From about the 10th-place finisher to where Todd finished, there was only a 15-second lapse.

"The course was one of those that would allow you to get out real fast, and with the conditions (heat, humidity, altitude) like they were, that could have been a killer. Todd was smart and had something left for all of the uphill running there was at the end of the race."

The K-State women's team was not as fortunate as Trask, battling mishaps and a physical disaster in finishing last in the 22-team field.

Just moments into the race, senior Renee Russell fell, effectively taking her out of the running to help her team score well in the competition. And halfway through the race sophomore Paulette Staats collapsed after a blackout.

That was that.

Staats had a similar bout with the heat earlier this season at the Cal-Poly San Luis Obispo meet and had been examined by a doctor. The findings of that exam were that Staats was not getting a proper veinous blood return to her heart, and it was suggested that she wear tights in coming races to speed the blood return to the heart things a lot. We will improve a lot. We can only move up. We will move forward."

Meanwhile, the Lady Jays were enjoying a 55.8 percent shooting effort.

K-State scored the final seven points of the first half to battle back to a 42-31 deficit at intermission. The string ended with Mary Jo Miller scoring her first field goal of the game, a three-pointer at the buzzer. Miller had seven first-half points and finished the game with nine.

The Lady Cats had two players in double figures as seniors Leah Honeycutt and Jennifer Grebing added 10.

Those are the players that Yow credited with keeping the game close.

"Leah and Jen pulled us back," Yow said. "M.J.'s three got us back to 11 and I really think that really gave us a lift going into the locker room."

On the other side, Crieghton put four starters in double figures. Kris Kugel scored 16, Shannon Struby added 13, Kathy Halligan 12 and Becky Strathman 10.

The major worry for Yow after the game was inside play, especially defense. The Lady Cats allowed 52 points by Creighton's inside players.

"We are majorly concerned with our inside play," Yow said. "It's something that we can get better at. Our post defense is a problem now."

The Lady Cats lost their first game last Monday in a different fashion. After trailing 29-28 at the half, K-State came back to tie it up at 64-64 at the end of regulation. Illinois-Chicago outscored K-State 8-4 in the overtime period.

muscle.

She did just that at the Big Eight and Region V meets, and her performances at both were outstanding.

Capriotti will take it from there.

"She came up to me at the end of the men's race — and it was a hot day — and told me, 'Coach, it's hot out here, and I don't want to wear these (tights).' So she took them off and appeared to be getting along fine.

"I wasn't there when she went down, but Todd told me that all of a sudden she was out on her feet. She was fine after a few minutes, but that was the final nail for us."

One bright spot in the women's race was the performance of freshman Jeanene Rugan, who placed 138th and covered the 3.1-mile course in 18:53.3. Others scoring for the K-State women were Janet Treiber, Martha Pinto, Jennifer Hillier and Russell, who returned from her early fall to finish the race.

Capriotti said he was pleased with the performance of the women all season, despite their disappointing national showing.

"I thought about it a lot this week after the girls went home," he said. "And we really ran well in a lot of races.

"But our expectations are so high here that running well in the national meet is not enough for us."

Evaluations provide feedback

Non-tenured faculty must be evaluated each semester to determine effectiveness

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Those teacher evaluations, long awaited by both frustrated and impressed students, are around the corner.

Before the semester is over, students will get to express their opinions — good or bad — about their teachers.

Victoria Clegg, assistant professor of planning and evaluation services, said the faculty handbook states that non-tenured faculty members are required to be rated by students.

The decision on whether tenured faculty have to use student evaluations rests on the different departmental units within the different colleges, she said.

Vice Provost Robert Kruh said professors use the evaluations to help determine their salary increases and to get feedback from students about their teaching effectiveness.

Kruh said being a tenured professor is a lifetime commitment, so the administration takes decisions about who to tenure very seriously.

"We do not just give tenure to an OK person," he said. "It goes to the best person we can get, given the resources that are available."

To qualify for tenure, a faculty member is evaluated on instructional teaching, research and service.

Student evaluations are the source for the instructional teaching part.

Departments also decide what kind of system will be used for evaluations.

IDEA and TEVAL are both offered to K-State teaching faculty as means of obtaining student input regarding specific courses and instructional methods.

The IDEA system, which has been around since early 1970s, is designed to help faculty members improve their teaching by relating progress on the course objectives to specific teaching procedures.

This system is best suited for use with the traditional university classroom situation, Clegg said.

It takes about 10 minutes for students to complete the form, which includes 38 standard questions. Faculty members have an option of asking 15 additional questions.

Clegg said IDEA evaluations are used in 300-500 classes each semester.

TEVAL is a more recently developed system that was designed to aid in administrative recommendations, especially in recommendations for non-tenured faculty, Clegg said.

This form asks 14 questions intended to be applicable to any class situation. There is also an option of adding up to 20 questions in order for departments or faculty members to encourage student responses to specific instructional situations.

Students may also write their own additional comments or respond to any open-ended questions devised by the professor.

Clegg said the TEVAL system is used in 1,100-1,200 classes each semester.

"IDEA is a good method used for evaluation, while TEVAL is still being developed," Clegg said.

No matter what form a professor uses, they are all scanned on a computer by Planning and Evaluation Services, and the report is returned to the appropriate department.

It is the responsibility of the department head or director to review and evaluate student opinions relative to undergraduate and graduate teaching effectiveness.

Professors are allowed to see the forms only after the grades have been submitted.

Clegg said some professors give evaluations twice a semester.

have given me at the time," she said.

"I had a crash course in development. The technical knowledge I gained came from textbooks and from the field at the same time.

"I wasn't the one who grew the wheat, but I had to know how to grow it," she said.

She spent much of her time on the road, visiting the volunteers and helping them with problems such as homesickness.

"We had what we called the critical three-month point. That was when reality hit the volunteers, and the novelty of the new experience had worn off," Michie said.

Michie said some of the volunteers didn't make it past the three-month point and went home early.

"It was a different philosophy of Peace Corps at the time. Today, Peace Corps is much more specialized in terms of recruitment.

"I think because of the change, Peace Corps has lost something over the years. Someone who has purely technical orientation is perhaps not the best volunteer," she said.

Aruna mentioned two American nurses she supervised who refused to work on their project without the modern equipment they were accustomed to using.

"They said they couldn't work under those conditions because it would compromise their standards.

"You and I both know that a needle can be boiled in a saucepan and sterilized, or you can sit around and wait for the heavens to rain autoclaves," she said.

Michie said this attitude, however, was not true of all the technically trained people.

After working as an associate director for two years, Aruna formed some opinions about what it takes to be a successful volunteer.

"I would recommend the Peace Corps with a caution. If you are going in to discover yourself, forget it.

"You need to be a self-confident person to do it." she said. "The basic beliefs that you hold will be challenged. It is not a place to grow up."

Shuttle

Flight rules stipulate that a shuttle return as soon as possible to Edwards, rather than the other landing sites, when a navigational unit fails. The 44-square-mile dry lakebed is considered the least risky touchdown spot.

About 2,700 people gathered in 54-degree temperature to watch Atlantis arrive at the base.

The shuttle rolled almost to the end of the 5.2-mile runway before its brakes were applied to test the hardness of the runway which may be used for more landings in the future, Nagel said.

Some observers noticed a small object on the runway after the landing, but Nagel said he didn't know if it fell off the shuttle or came from a vehicle in the convoy that greets the spacecraft.

Before the landing, flight director Phil Engelauf said the shuttle could fly with two navigational devices, called inertial measurement units, or IMUs. The units tell on-board computers where the shuttle is and how fast it's going.

The failed unit was disconnected from the orbiter computer system. Although the device was able to provide correct data on the ship's orientation, it gave the wrong speed, NASA said.

The astronauts were not supposed to return to Earth until Wednesday, after 10 days in space. Atlantis blasted off on the year's last shuttle flight on Nov. 24; the crew successfully dispatched a missile-warning satellite for the Pentagon the next day.

It is only the second time in 44 shuttle flights that NASA has called a crew home early because of equipment failure. The first was in November 1981 on shuttle trip No. 2 — a fuel cell on Columbia failed.

The Atlantis astronauts clearly were disappointed about missing a few more days in space. Before going to sleep Saturday night, Gregory jokingly told Mission Control, "Keep the winds high at Edwards."

Astronaut Story Musgrave managed to set a shuttle-flying record despite the early return.

"We've added up your hours in space and ... you've passed 576 hours in space, making you the most-flown shuttle astronaut," Mission Control told Musgrave, a four-time space flyer, on Saturday night.

"Are you sure you can't get us four more days here?" Musgrave asked.

When told that was unlikely, Musgrave said, "It's been an incredible experience, a heck of a privilege and I'm looking forward to a lot more."

The astronauts spent most of the mission conducting surveillance experiments for the Defense Department and medical tests for NASA. They used high-powered cameras, binoculars and a telescope to zoom in on U.S. military ships, aircraft and other targets 224 miles below.

They performed an unexpected job Thursday night when they had to steer out of the way of part of an old Soviet rocket. It was only the second time in the 10-year-old shuttle program that a spaceship had to dodge space junk. The first time was just 2 1/2 months ago.

NASA stretched the flight to 10 days more than a year ago so the crew could conduct additional medical experiments. Scientists wanted more information on how the body adapts to weightlessness in preparation of longer missions.

The crew includes four space rookies. They are pilot Terence "Tom" Henricks, James Voss, Mario Runco Jr. and Thomas Hennen, an Army imagery analyst.

"The elements of trust are decisive, and matters will progress toward the better," the statement said.

The announcement followed the release Sunday of 25 Arab detainees by Israel's allied militia in southern Lebanon. It also came after last month's releases of American Thomas Sutherland and Briton Terry Waite.

Meanwhile, U.N. hostage envoy Giandomenico Picco was in the Syrian capital of Damascus, where he met with Syria's foreign minister.

A U.N. statement, issued at Picco's request in Damascus late Sunday, said: "A basic understanding has also been reached on a comprehensive approach to the remaining humanitarian issues," including the freeing of Lebanese detained by Israel and its proxy force in south Lebanon, and toward recovering Israelis missing or dead in Lebanon.

Both factors are key to resolving the hostage ordeal, which U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar said would be over by Christmas.

The U.N. statement said that after the latest round of negotiations, important progress has been made on the road to a solution of the issue of the Western hostages in Lebanon.

The statement provided no details.

There was no new word from the kidnappers on weekend news reports that Alann Steen, another American hostage, would be freed by Wednesday and that the only other American hostage, Terry Anderson, would be out within 10 days. Two Germans and an Italian are also missing in Lebanon.

An earlier statement from Revolutionary Justice delivered to a Western news agency in Beirut said the kidnappers decided to free Cicippio within 48 hours after positive results from negotiations among the United Nations, Syria, Lebanon and Iran.

"It looks real," Cicippio's Lebanese wife, Elham, said in Beirut of the promise to free him. "Inshallah (God willing) it will be true."

Cicippio's brother Thomas said in Norristown that he was on pins and needles hoping for Cicippio's freedom.

He said the State Department called Sunday and was hopeful.

The kidnappers' earlier communique praised U.N. efforts to end the hostage ordeal and said the United Nations had agreed to push Israel to free more Arab detainees.

Israel, in a statement from its defense ministry, said the 25 detainees were released in response to a request by Perez de Cuellar for a gesture to help the process.

Israel said its hostage-negotiation team had been in contact with the secretary-general and his aides to discuss an overall hostage deal including word on the fate of four Israeli soldiers missing in Lebanon.

In Damascus, Picco met Sunday with Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa to thank Syria for its help in freeing the hostages, the official Syrian Arab News Agency reported. Picco arrived in the Middle East late last week.

The 25 Arab detainees were released from the Khiam prison in Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, and all but four left the Israeli-controlled area. A statement from the pro-Iranian Hezbollah, or Party of God, said they would be welcomed with festivities in Beirut.

The release of hundreds of Arabs held by Israel and its allied militia in southern Lebanon has been a key demand of Shiite kidnappers. Several previous hostage releases were linked to the freeing of Arab detainees, but the release last month of Sutherland and Waite apparently was not a direct hostage-for-prisoner swap.

and provide for their well-being while at the center," Purgason said.

The students receive free schooling, a living stipend of at least $40 per month, a clothing allowance per year and free housing and food. Also provided at no cost are medical services including dental and psychological care.

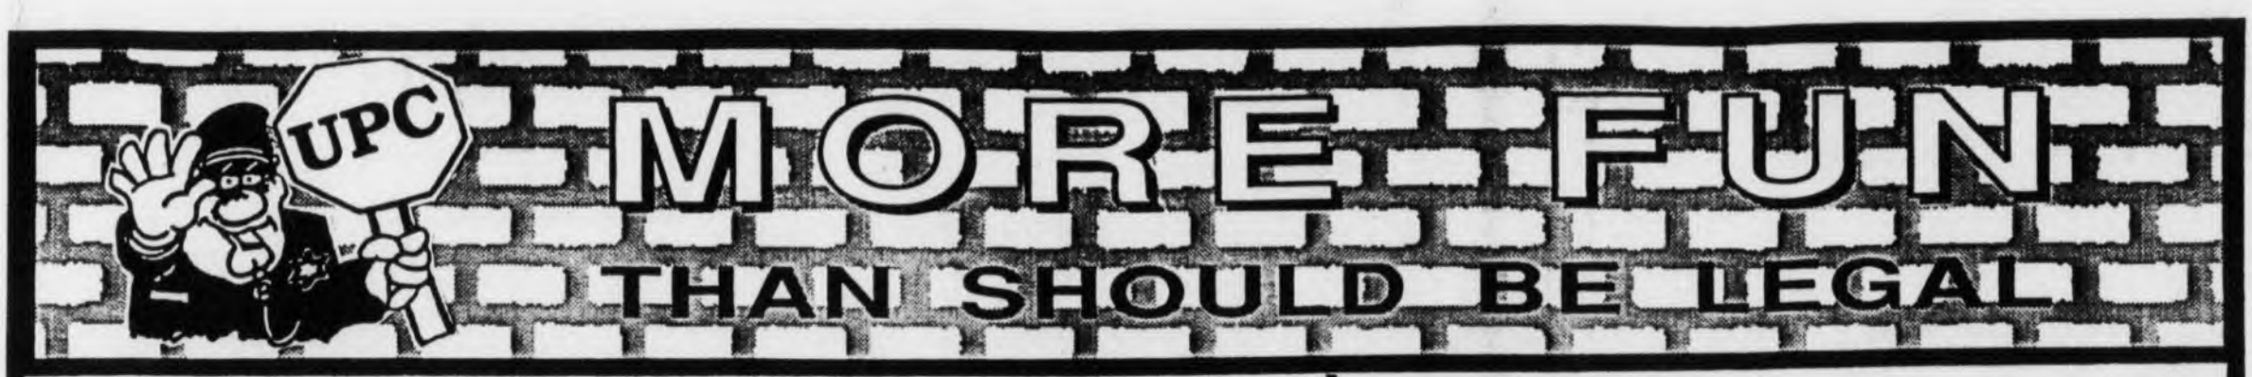
Acceptance into the program also sets up an agreement to abide by the center's rules in exchange for the education.

The students are tested for drugs and alcohol, which, if found is probable reason for dismissal.

"Most of the kids we get want to be here. But, like anything else, there are a few who give us trouble. In these cases, we have the authority to dismiss them. Likewise, students have the ability to leave anytime they wish. The catch is they can't come back," Maranville said.

"We accept the challenge to motivate these kids," Purgason said. "Forty percent have a diploma. The rest are drop-outs. We take great care to provide a controlled atmosphere because really that's what they need. Everything we do is structured, yet very livable, and we do offer incentive programs."

Both men stressed the importance of creating self-motivation and confidence for the kids. The school is set up on a task-completion system. The student is given a task to complete, and once done, another task is assigned and so on until graduation. This reduces the competitive situation in the classroom and promotes accomplishment at an individual pace.



Totally unique to the Flint Hills center is a Solo-Parent program and Early Childhood Development Center. This is the only center out of the 108 currently operating that has set up a program for unwed mothers. Child care is provided free of charge while the mother is taking classes.

The development center will be set up as a Head Start program for the children. According to Purgason, this is an experimental program with many positive implications, especially for K-State.

Purgason said Manhattan was chosen as a site partially because of K-State's resources.

Sue Maes, associate director of the Division of Continuing Education at K-State, said she sees great potential for students to be involved in the center.

"We have been asked to serve as a liaison for volunteers and clubs to be involved in the Job Corps center. Some possibilities include tutoring and internships," Maes said. "There is great potential for students in human development studies, speech and social work."

Verbal abuse part of job

KSU student parking officers have to be easy-going

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Some students serve food to finance their education. Some people clean floors. Some people work at a convenience store. Lance Lunsway, graduate student in education, pays for his education by getting abused and harassed on a daily basis.

Lunsway is parking enforcement supervisor of the K-State Department of Public Safety. He's in charge of a staff of 16 workers who are trained to write parking tickets, direct traffic and listen to verbal abuse on a daily basis.

"We get yelled at all the time," Lunsway said. "You get called a traitor, and we hear some pretty foul language. It gets a little shaky sometimes, that's why we have a two-way radio. Some people will just be passing by, it's not even their car we're ticketing, and they'll yell at us."

Twenty-five students applied this semester to fill the five minimum-wage positions available with the K-State Police.

Lunsway said applicants for the job needed to have a good personality and be easy-going, because the job can be very stressful.

"I tell the officers that they can't take it personally when people yell at them. It is the situation they are mad at, not the person," Lunsway said.

Ticket writers wear a number instead of a name on their identification badges for their own safety. Parking enforcement officers at K-State work at least 14 hours a week, Lunsway said.

"Officers do not work on a quota system, like some students think," Lunsway said. "During a typical shift, a parking officer will write about 40 tickets an hour," said one worker who asked not to be identified.

The officers have the campus divided into six zones and, like postal workers, write tickets in all kinds of weather.

"Just because it's snowing doesn't mean we won't issue tickets," Lunsway said.

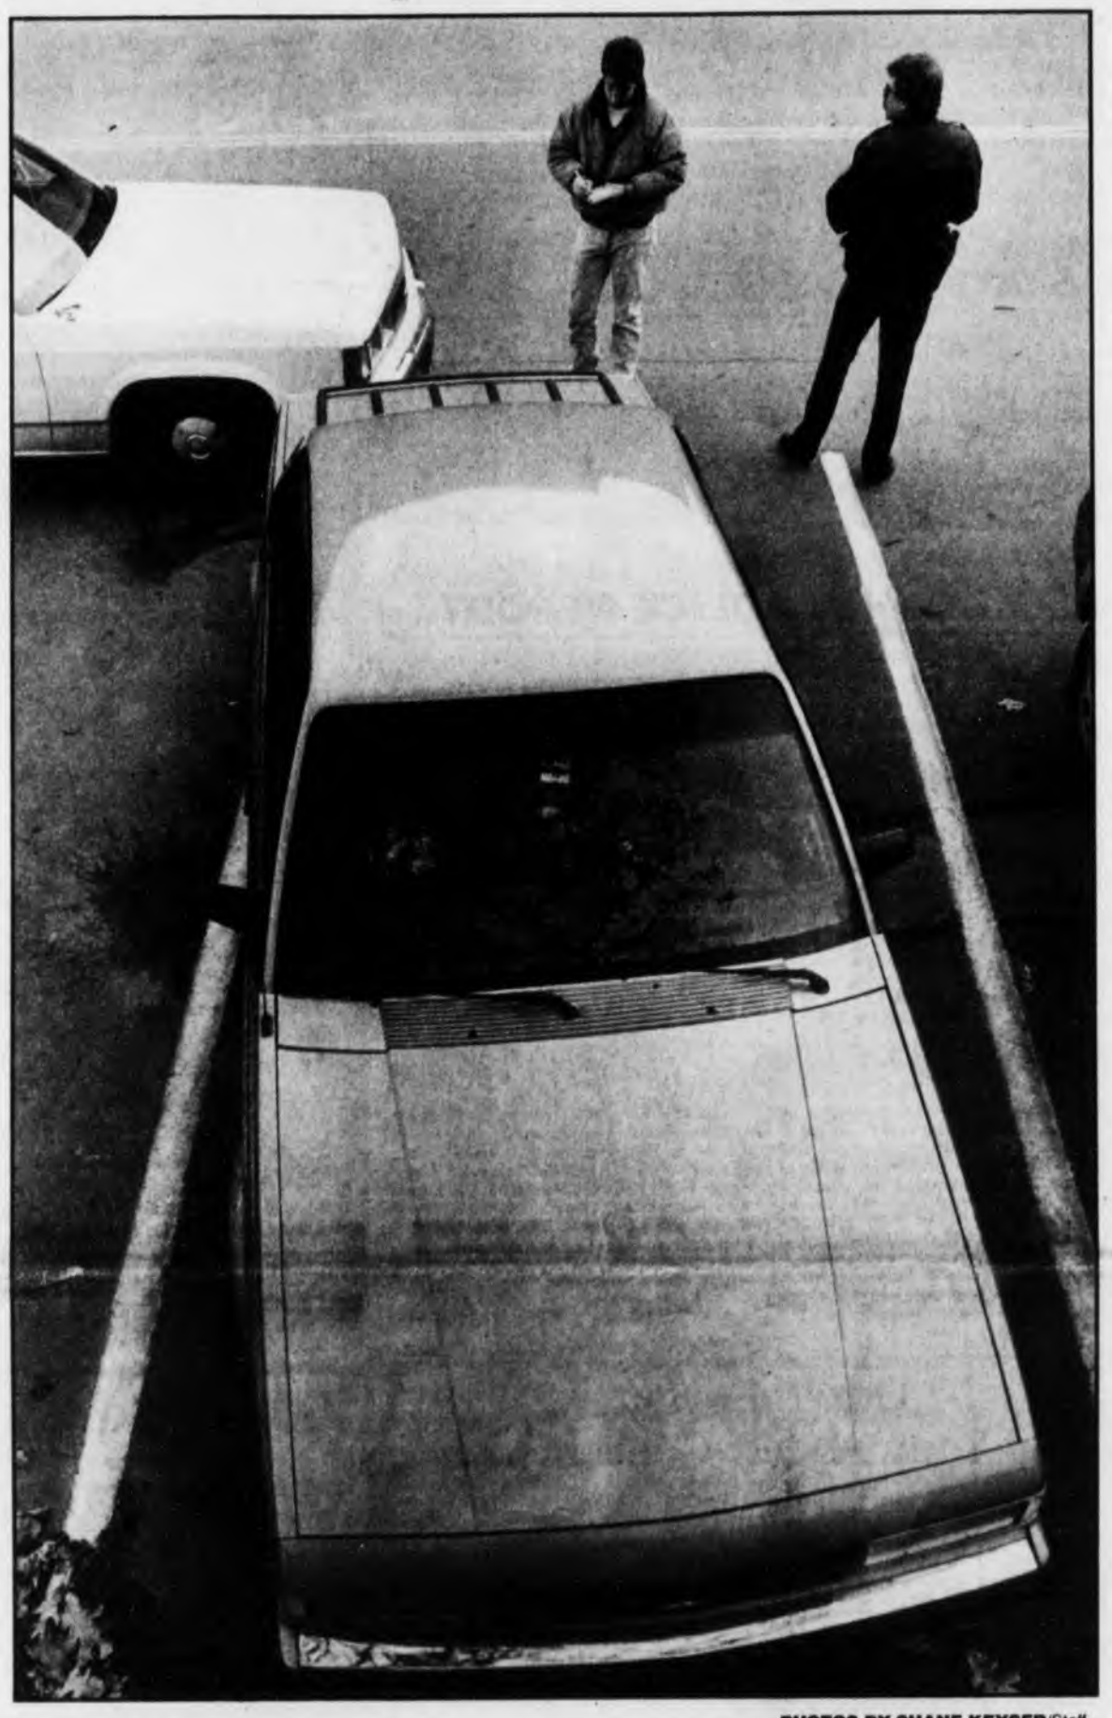
In addition to ticket writing, the officers call the police station when students have a flat tire or lock their keys in the car.

"We want to help if we can, but we have to enforce the law," Lunsway said.

Sometimes, the ticket writers take the blame for campus parking problems.

"Once in a while, a student will rip up a ticket and throw it at the officer," Lunsway said. "They still have to pay it."

Carrie Pugh, freshman in business,said she is one of the students who keeps the ticket writers busy. She said she has received 12 parking tickets this semester.



Pugh lives in Goodnow Hall, works at Bramlage Coliseum and paid $40 for a parking permit that allows her to park in lot B-3 located near Haymaker Hall.

"There is no way I can park in B-3 and get to work on time," Pugh said. "One ticket I got was at 5:45 in the morning. I thought that was ridiculous."

Lunsway said any tickets issued after 5 p.m. or before 8 a.m. are issued by campus police officers and not by the parking enforcement officers.

"Students can take complaints to the Parking Council," Lunsway said. "There isn't a university I know of without a parking problem. K-State is running out of room. Maybe students need to consider walking, riding a bike or car pooling."

Lunsway said he hasn't gotten too many parking tickets himself — he rides a motorcycle to campus.

Ukrainian independence vote passes

2nd-richest republic elects president

By the Associated Press

KIEV, U.S.S.R.— Ukrainians voted 9-to-1 for independence and elected former Communist Leonid Kravchuk as their president in a severe rebuff to Mikhail Gorbachev's efforts to preserve the Soviet Union.

"The Soviet Union has disintegrated," Kravchuk said Monday during a meeting with people from the United States and a dozen other countries who observed Sunday's election. "An independent Ukraine is born."

Russia, the largest and most populous of the Soviet republics, moved quickly to recognize its neighbor, a measure that could seal Ukrainian secession and is a major blow to Soviet unity.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin, whose republic now controls nearly all Kremlin functions, said late Monday he believed "it is necessary and possible to quickly establish new inter-governmental relations, including diplomatic relations, between Russia and the Ukraine," Russian television said.

Kravchuk said the Ukraine would establish collective control of Soviet nuclear weapons with Russia, Byelorussia and Kazakhstan — the other republics where Soviet nuclear warheads are based.

Ukrainian leaders also said they would move quickly to draw up a new constitution balancing the executive and legislative branches, form an army from Soviet troops in the Ukraine, control exports to other republics, and issue a new currency.

"I always believed this would happen, but I never thought it would be so soon!" said an elated Polly Donchyk, a founder of the nationalist movement Rukh. The crowd belted out "Oh Canada" and cheered when Canadian recognition was announced.

Neighboring Poland also recognized the Ukraine state Monday, apparently the first country to do so.

The United States said it was "moving toward full diplomatic recognition" of the Ukraine. White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said it would be "some time until we are ready to make final decisions," but he made it clear the United States planned to recognize Ukrainian independence.

He said a special envoy would go to the Ukraine this week and Secretary of State James Baker planned to visit Moscow and Kiev later this month to discuss the transition to independence.

Cicippio freed after 5 years as hostage

Terry Anderson, Alann Steen only two left in captivity

By the Associated Press

WIESBADEN, Germany — American Joseph Cicippio arrived in Germany saying he felt "terrific" after being freed Monday from his long ordeal as a hostage in Lebanon.

Shiite Muslim kidnappers said another American captive would be freed by Thursday.

The Revolutionary Justice Organization released Cicippio, 61, of Norristown, Pa., from more than five years' captivity. He was taken to Damascus, Syria, and then flown to Germany and brought to the U.S. military hospital in Wiesbaden.

After a preliminary examination, officials said Cicippio "has no apparent urgent medical problems, other than some needed dental work."

A U.S. military news release said, "Mr. Cicippio says that he feels well and is in good spirits."

Early Tuesday, another hostage-holding faction — the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine — said American educator-administrator Alann Steen would be freed within 48 hours.

That would leave Terry Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent of The Associated Press, kidnapped on March 16, 1985, as the lone American left. Two Germans are also held. An Italian is missing, but reports say he is dead.

Cicippio was the eighth Western hostage freed since August, when the kidnappers asked the United Nations to intervene.

In Damascus, Cicippio was reunited with his Lebanese wife, Elham, and she was with him at the hospital in Wiesbaden.

U.S. Navy Cmdr. John Woodhouse, a military spokesman, said he expects Cicippio will be at the hospital for a few days' medical tests and State Department debriefings.

The examination apparently dispelled earlier concern about Cicippio's health.

Woodhouse said Cicippio "enjoyed a midnight snack of two sandwiches" at the hospital "and is now getting some rest. Tomorrow he is scheduled for more medical examinations."

Cicippio's family in Norristown said earlier they were worried by his appearance. His sister, Helen Fazio, cried throughout a televised news

13 car pileup delays I-70 traffic

Few minor injuries reported; inattentive driving caused wrecks

DARLA GOODMAN
Staff Writer

Students returning to Manhattan after Thanksgiving break Sunday night faced a delay on Interstate 70 near Junction City.

Thirteen vehicles were involved in accidents between mileposts 295 and 300, a single-lane section of highway undergoing repairs. There were a few minor injuries, the Geary County Sheriff's Department said.

Kim Smith, freshman in hotel and restaurant management, said she had to stop in traffic at 6:35 p.m. about one mile west of Junction City, just before the traffic merged into one lane. She said it took her 45 minutes to go 6 miles. The first four miles took a half an hour.

Traffic was backed up at least five miles in front of and behind her car, she said.

"It was bumper to bumper," Smith said. "We were completely stopped for a while, and then we'd move five feet or so."

Laura McAdams, junior in journalism and mass communications, was returning to Manhattan from Wichita between 5:30 and 6 p.m.

She said the part of the drive that usually takes 20-25 minutes took about

City dumps sales tax proposal

Profits from half-cent increase would have aided K-State programs

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Staff Writer

The Manhattan city proposal to gain enabling legislation to impose a half-cent tax increase with profits aimed at K-State programs was cut temporarily due to a lack of focus at a commission committee workshop last Tuesday.

"Manhattan can't capitalize without legislation," City Manager Mike Conduff said. Conduff said the growth of K-State is of good economic benefit to Manhattan, and it is the city's responsibility to facilitate a community partnership. Conduff proposed enabling legislation for the half-cent tax increase proposal to be at the disposal of Manhattan residents to vote for or against.

Members of the city commission listened to a broadbased committee assigned to investigate the proposal and weigh the pros and cons of enabling legislation within the community. The committee, comprised of Manhattan businessmen and women and K-State professors, discussed results of the research during the workshop. Members of the committee said the general mood of the community was against the proposal.

Chris Heavey, manager of Manhattan Town Center, said he was opposed to enabling legislation promoting a sales tax fund. He also said he questioned the expectations of the money invested in the proposal concerning jobs and goods and services offered within the region.

"Citizens need to see X, Y and Z and a certain amount of time to raise

Winter wonderland comes to K-State

Mortar Board and the Union Program Council will bring a winter wonderland to K-State Monday through Saturday.

Some events planned include performances by the Men's and Women's Glee Clubs, a preview from Winter Dance, pictures with Santa Claus Wednesday and Thursday and daily specials in the Union.

Mortar Board has also planned a "Concert in Winter Wonderland" for 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Forum Hall.

Brian Linin, senior in mechanical engineering and event coordinator for the project, said the Mortar Board started planning event in the spring. This is the event's first year.

Linin said the Union was decorated and Mortar Board and UPC have a table in the Union to answer questions and give people a place to donate toys during the week.

"On Tuesday and Thursday, Willie the Wildcat will be dressed up as Santa Claus and taking pictures in the Union," Linin said.

Pam Watson, senior in elementary education, is coordinating the Christmas party for underprivileged children.

"We will be collecting toys all through the week and at the Concert on Tuesday night for the kids," Watson said.

Holiday fire damages students' home

A three-story house occupied by eight students was damaged by fire on Thanksgiving day.

The fire at 1011 Laramie St. started in the basement and spread to the first floor. Most damage was from smoke.

The building is managed by John Pence, K-State Associate Director of Housing and Dining Services. Pence said some of the students would move into another house he managed, while others would move into their fraternity house.

Scott Green, senior in psychology, said he moved back into his fraternity house after the fire and hoped the house on Laramie would be repaired by next semester so he wouldn't have to find a new apartment.

"I'm moving from room to room now and sleeping on any available bed," Green said.

Local fire classified as incendiary

The fire that caused an estimated $30,000 damage last week at the Coleman American Moving Services Inc. is being classified as incendiary.

The Manhattan Fire Department received the call at 9:41 p.m. Nov. 26, and the department responded to the company at 615 S. 11th St.

Joyce Ducati, Manhattan Fire Department administrative aid, said incendiary meant the fire was intentionally set, but differs from arson.

"Arson would have to have a reason to defraud behind it — where incendiary wouldn't," Ducati said.

The department estimated damage and clean-up costs at $30,000. Ducati said the damage was primarily to empty storage boxes at the company.

"There was no content loss," she said.

The building was also being used by Fort Riley personnel to store storage material used by soldiers to ship belongings back from Operation Desert Storm.

Kids, parents curse Santa

KAIKOHE, New Zealand (AP) — So much for the Christmas spirit.

Children turned nasty when Santa Claus, alias John Field, ran out of the candy and balloons he was passing out in this small North Island town during the annual parade marking the start of the Christmas season.

The young ones began swearing and kicking at Field.

Some adults also became rude and aggressive, he said, asking sarcastically, "Is this another government cut?"

Field said he was amazed and saddened by Saturday's incident, which he called a product of hard times.

American soldier convicted of espionage

HEIDELBERG, Germany (AP)— An American soldier has admitted he spied for Jordan during the Desert Storm buildup and was sentenced to 34 years in prison, the U.S. Army said Monday.

Army headquarters in Heidelberg said Spc. Albert Sombolay also admitted getting in touch with Iraqi officials. He pleaded guilty to charges of espionage and contacting the enemy.

Sombolay was paid "about $1,300 for his activities," the Army said.

Sombolay was arrested March 29 and sentenced in July, but information about the case was delayed so investigators could continue the probe, the Army statement said. It provided no other details.

"During an investigation prior to his arrest, Sombolay had told an undercover agent he had initiated contact with the Jordanian and Iraqi embassies in Belgium and Germany in December 1990," the American military said.

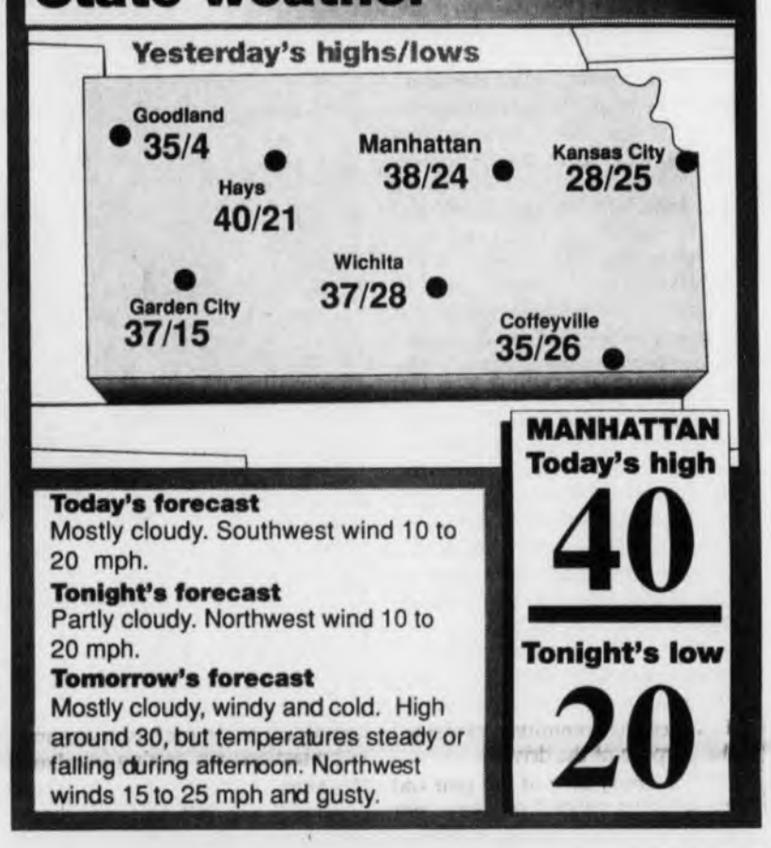
Ray also reported criminal damage to his white 1990 Ford Probe. Loss is $800. Reports were filed.

At 12:00 p.m., Jared M. Douthit, 1965 College Heights Road, was arrested on Pottawatomie County warrant 91-CR899 for misdemeanor checks. Douthit was confined in lieu of $126 cash bond. A report was filed.



At 12:05 p.m., Andrea Treharne, 530 Bluemont Ave., reported a major-damage, minor-injury accident at Sixth Street and Bluemont Avenue involving vehicles driven by Keith Figge, 505 Vattier St., and Kathy J. Martin, 322 Moro St. Passengers in the Martin vehicle, Chantelle Martin, 322 Moro St., and Patrick Phillips, 3216 State St., were transported by Riley County Ambulance to Memorial Hospital for possible neck and abdominal injuries. A report was filed.

Lighting kicks off drive

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

K-State Concert Choir members Amy Kickhaefer, senior in music education, and Sara Osborne, junior in music, sing the last carol of the night after the lighting of the Mayor's Holiday Tree Monday night in Triangle Park. The ceremony is an annual event.

Flint Hills Breadbasket goal 120,000 pounds of food, expanding participation

MICHELLE POULIN
Collegian Reporter

A wave of applause swept through Triangle Park in Aggieville Monday night as the Mayor's Holiday Tree food drive began with the turning on of the Christmas tree lights.

About 200 area citizens crowded the park for the sixth time in the drive's history. The K-State Concert Choir provided entertainment by singing Christmas carols while refreshments were served by the K-State Hospitality Management Club.

Randy Martin, president of the Chamber of Commerce and co-chairman of the Mayor's Holiday Tree steering committee, explained the purpose of the drive.

"It's a busy time of the year and we all have needs," he said. "For some, the holidays are a time of worry and demand, and that's what the (Flint hills) Breadbasket is about — helping to feed the hungry."

Last year, 1,538 families were fed during the holiday season thanks to the efforts of the Breadbasket, 338 more than in 1988 and the number is rising. A number of money donations and 100,390 pounds of food were also collected last year. The money goes to provide the families with perishable items like meat and dairy products.

The Breadbasket has set this season's goals of gathering 120,000 pounds of food and of expanding community participation.

Cheryl Sieben, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association and member of the steering committee, said more businesses and organizations are getting involved this year.

"As of our last meeting, there were 80 businesses involved in the Pacesetters section of the fund. These are people donating 100 pounds of food or $100 to the Breadbasket," Sieben said. "In addition to the Pacesetters section, many businesses donate smaller amounts that are just as important."

Pizza Hut has issued a challenge to other restaurants around Manhattan. Civic organizations have also challenged each other to donate food and money.

Sponsored by the Chevrolet Corporation, John Murdock, owner of Murdock Chevrolet, will be donating $500 to the fund for every truckload of food donated at the dealership.

Area merchants have baskets set up to take donations, and some have plans to do extra promotions.

"Here in Aggieville, we have set up a children's movie for Saturday where admittance is a can of food," Sieben said. "At the games, K-Rock (KMKF-FM 101.5) is handing out color pictures of the K-State basketball team in exchange for a can of food, and the Kansas National Guard has volunteered to handle transporting of the food."

Manhattan Mayor Gene Klingler did the honors of turning on the tree's lights and spoke of the spirit of giving.

"This tree symbolizes our community spirit and our holiday spirit," Klingler said.

Members of the Phi Kappa Tau fraternity took the food donated at the holiday tree ceremony to the Breadbasket.

"We were just helping by loading the trucks and delivering the food," said Jason Sullivan, freshman in engineering.

Food items will be distributed Dec. 21 by volunteers at the Breadbasket.

Trial boosts slow season in Palm Beach

Ice cream parlor boasts 'trial flavors;' stores sell T-shirts

By the Associated Press

PALM BEACH, Fla. — The peak winter season hasn't yet begun, but the social calendar is busy in Palm Beach this week.

Charity luncheons. The opera. Seniors polo matches. And, of course, the rape trial that has brought more attention to the sun-blessed resort than it has seen since the early 1960s, when the property at 1095 N. Ocean Blvd. was know as the Winter White House.

These days, that address is best known as the place where William Kennedy Smith, a nephew of the late President Kennedy, allegedly raped a young woman after a night of drinking with another uncle, Sen. Edward Kennedy.

Opening statements in Smith's trial are scheduled to begin Monday, and the man at the center of the latest Kennedy furor was reported to have spent a quiet Sunday at the family compound meeting with his lawyers.

"They're just, obviously, going over some last-minute plans," a spokeswoman for Smith, Barbara Gamarekian, said Sunday afternoon.

She added that Smith, a 31-year-old medical school graduate, "is as I have always known him — he's confident, and he's really ready, eager to get this trial under way."

His accuser, a 30-year-old woman whose stepfather's wealth helped give her entree to Palm Beach's social scene, was also reported to be secluded with her family in anticipation of the trial.

It is the event of the season in Palm Beach, perhaps the wealthiest and most status-conscious of American resorts, a place where even Kennedys have lacked the social pedigree to be fully accepted.

Local businesses, at least the few that are affordable without a trust fund, have been delighted by the invasion of an estimated 500 reporters, photographers and producers.

The Smith trial has created "a whole new market," said Jim Metzger, a

Palestinians on their way to talks

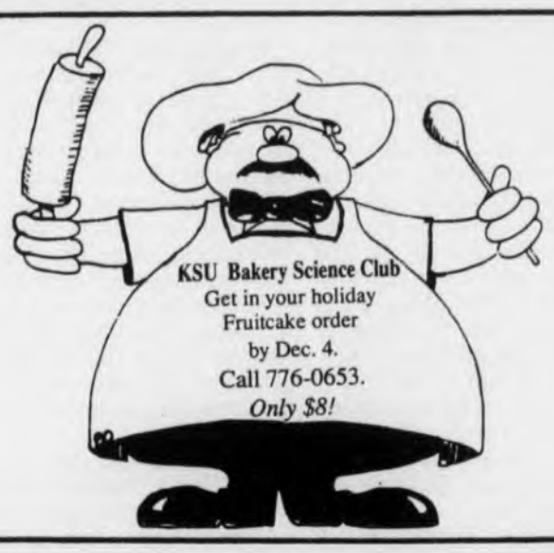
Delegates, U.S. resolve visa dispute for PLO advisers

By the Associated Press

AMMAN, Jordan— Palestinian delegates to the Arab-Israeli peace talks resolved a dispute with the United States over visas for seven PLO advisers and decided today to participate in the next round in Washington, a delegate said.

"The problem was solved, and we will be traveling to Washington tonight," said Samir Abdullah, a member of the 14-man Palestinian delegation to the talks, which the Bush administration scheduled to begin Wednesday.

The visa issue had threatened to become a second potential snag for the next round of negotiations.



Israel has objected to that date, complaining it was not consulted ahead of time, and said its delegation would not arrive until Dec. 9. The Israeli Cabinet reaffirmed that stand Sunday.

Jordan, the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon all accepted the U.S. invitation for the talks scheduled for Wednesday, which are a follow-up to the peace conference that began in Madrid, Spain, on Oct. 30.

But a Palestinian delegate, Ghassan Khatib, said earlier today the group would stay home unless visas were given to seven Palestine Liberation Organization officials who planned

Stay calm

Finals do not have to be detrimental to health and happiness

"OK. Stay calm.

"It's 4:25. Still a good four hours until my test. I can read the last three chapters, reread the notes I got from that brainy guy I sit by (when I go), and I'll still have time to brush my teeth and get to campus.

"Now, where'd that Jolt™ pop and my pack of cigarettes go?"

It seems that most college students, unfortunately, are all too familiar with nights like this.

For whatever reason, few of us feel prepared when that dreaded week creeps up and grabs us by the throat with no plans of letting go until we're flying down I-70 toward eggnog and cheesy carols, still cursing the books and teachers and alarm clocks that somehow failed to wake us up when we said, "I'll just get up early and finish studying."

Save yourself the heartache and broken-out face. Start studying for finals today.

Nothing short of a miracle can save anyone from an entire semester of goofing off, and no one can learn a semester's worth of material in a couple of days. But anyone, from the most diligent student to the one who sleeps through most school days and guesses on the tests, can benefit from this advice.

Start now, even if it's just looking at the syllabus and figuring out what will be on the test.

These last couple of weeks always seem to fly by as fast as the new winter wind that has started whipping your hair and papers around as you duck from hall to hall on the way to class.

Think of it this way. After taking that first final Monday, won't it be nice to know you're prepared enough for the next one that you can go out and celebrate with — or cry in — a beer before you hit the books again?

It's just protocol, plain and simple

Dan, you were a bad boy.

By calling Mario Cuomo, governor of New York and a possible Democratic candidate for president, by his first name, you broke an unspoken rule of manners: Do not address someone you don't know on a personal level by his first name on a national TV show, especially if it might be construed as an effort to discredit him through bringing up his heritage.

Cuomo may have been thin-skinned over the matter. But even though his first name is Mario, as former K-Stater and White House Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater has stated so bluntly and repeatedly, it's not proper protocol.

Add the fact that it was probably done to highlight his Italian heritage, that's downright dubious. The campaign trail has barely started, and mud, in a form similar to that used by the Republicans against Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis in 1988, is proverbially flying.

The Republicans are already floundering in a tumultuous sea created by their own doings, though the election in 1992 is still theirs to lose.

An economic policy that's as existent as lost Atlantis, Chief of Staff John Sununu running amok at the White House, firebreather Pat Buchanun coming from the farther right and Southern neo-Nazi David Duke from the iron-fisted white right highlight their transgressions.

Dan Quayle's identity crisis in the public eye since the 1988 election is still apparent. Quayle's reaction over the "Doonesbury" satire does not improve the Republicans' current situation.

With Quayle and the Republicans in trouble this early in the campaign, it seems they took the easiest route in attempting to discredit a possible foe. And it isn't even primary time yet.

That crazy thing called COOL

JASON HAMILTON

Improved music scene for everyone

I went to a party the other night with a couple of friends of mine to hear a new band. It had been a long day, and I was hoping I'd have a lot of fun.

The band turned out to be really cool. The party turned out not to be. In fact, the party was decidedly un-cool.

It made me think of another party, one I went to during the summer. Three bands played at this party, but I was late getting there and only heard the last one, Tuber.

The party was pretty much like most others with which I'm familiar. The only thing that made it notable was its size. For a summer party in Manhattan, it was huge.

About two-thirds of the party was made up of high-schoolers and Fort Riley denizens who were pretty much stuck in Manhattan. The rest of us were the college students who had actually chosen to stay here or had nowhere else to go.

A fair number of the partiers were tripping on acid, several for the first time. There were a lot of glazed looks and paranoid mutterings serving as an undercurrent to Tuber's frenzied metal mash.

Looking around, I recognized a few of the people who had been in Manhattan for years and had helped get the live music scene here started. They looked bored.

A lot of interesting things happened to me at that party, but one jumped to the forefront of my memory the other night. As the summer party died down, two very preppie girls wearing greek letters stumbled toward me and the girl I was talking to, and they asked us where the keg was.

I sort of gestured toward the back of the lawn we were on, but the girl I was with had a completely different reaction.

Giving them a look that almost incinerated the poor girls where they stood, my friend ripped into them. "Why don't you people just go away? Can't you see that you people aren't wanted here?"

This reaction was unpleasant, but not unexpected. There were a lot of greeks and other clean-cut preppies at the party, and there was a good deal of resentment about that from the rest of the partiers.

I thought at the time that resentment was exactly the wrong thing for the "alternative crowd" to feel. I thought that they should be happy there were a lot of people, no matter who they were. The more people coming to hear the bands, the better the whole scene gets.

I didn't think about that party again until the other night on Delaware Street, where I re-examined my feelings on the subject.

The new band was energetic. They sounded like a collision between Jane's Addiction and the Dead Kennedys, with a schizophrenic koala for a lead singer. I liked them a lot.

The party, on the other hand, was fairly oppressive. The guys who had invited me had already ditched by the time I got there.

Perhaps I'm a little biased by the fact that some of the partiers were people who had attempted to visit harm upon my fragile body in the past, but I really thought the party was silly. The people bouncing to the music all had the same haircuts, the same clothes, the same dance. It was like prep-clone hell.

At one point, one of the girls throwing the party got up front and asked that we move the "pit" outside, and I laughed out loud. Maybe I missed it, but all I saw of the so-called "pit" was a bunch of people jumping up and down and headbanging. There wasn't anything remotely resembling slam dancing as far as I could tell.

Only four or five people seemed actually interested in the band. Most were trying hard to impress each other with how cool they were and were mostly concerned with keeping their cups full. I got the impression that a few of the partiers would actually rather that the band not be there.

After I left, I thought about the party, and what I felt was resentment. All I could think about is how nobody can come up with anything cool, like a good live music scene, without it being copied by thousands of half-brained, spoiled rich kids.

Suzie set me straight the next day, as she usually does.

"What's the difference between a bunch of those spoiled rich kids enjoying a cool band and a bunch of you spoiled poor kids enjoying a cool band?"

I tried to come up with a witty response, but I felt really foolish. I realized that what I felt, and what a lot of my friends were feeling, was possessiveness.

It's true that if it hadn't been for the more underground types in Manhattan, there wouldn't be much of a music scene at all, but to think of it as belonging to any one group is just useless.

I decided, in the end, to be happy that there was another cool band in Manhattan. We've gone so long without more than two or three decent bands at a time, we can't afford to be too picky.

LETTERS

Black greek organizations unique

Editor,

As a member of the oldest black greek letter sorority in the nation, I feel "Views differ on fraternity branding" in the Nov. 20 Collegian was an article that should not supersede the tangible functions of black greek letter organizations. This campus is fortunate to have representation from all the eight historically black fraternities and sororities. This fact, in and of itself, is unique to most predominately white institutions.

Amidst some unique characteristics, black greek letter organizations have academics and community service as common and primary goals. Many members of these organizations serve in numerous leadership positions on this campus and, therefore, give K-State a unique complement in its efforts to enhance diversity on this campus. Members of these organizations are active at both the graduate and undergraduate level, with memberships exceeding 60,000 and chapters throughout the world. These characteristics make black greek letter organizations significantly different from the K-State generic greek system, Panhellenic Council and Interfraternity Council.

We do not have "houses" on this campus. However, we are active advocates for service to our people and our nation. We are advocates for educating ourselves and promoting higher education for our young adults.

The Kappa Pi chapter of Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority at K-State has begun an excellent mentoring program with schoolgirls in the Manhattan community. Members of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity have been involved with numerous community services projects this semester and have offered the K-State community an opportunity to become better acquainted with some elements of black greek life by members being the host of a "step show" Dec. 6. Members of IFC and the K-State Panhellenic Council have been invited to participate, to look, listen and learn about our unique differences in a positive light. I encourage you to check us out.

Music bashing bothers some fans

Editor,

Good job, guys. Once again you've managed to send someone to bag on another concert and make people angry. Sometimes it's a mystery to me why the Collegian bothers to do reviews at all.

First and foremost has to do with Geoff Tate, his costume changes and the "Operation: Mindcrime" set in general. Heather Anderson obviously doesn't know much about the "Operation: Mindcrime" album, or she would have noticed Tate's costume changes coincide with the "Mindcrime" story line. On stage, Tate plays the part of Nikki, the "hero" of the "Mindcrime" album. The album is centered around the murder of a nun who broke her vow of chastity. They don't come right out and tell you who did it. You have to listen and figure it out.

The comment about Scott Rockenfield's "blunder" was an interesting interpretation. Perhaps Anderson hasn't been to enough concerts to realize that was to tease the audience. I've seen groups start songs and stop hundreds of times. It gets the crowd going.

In regard to the opening act, Warrior Soul, I knew they would get dogged. My friend and I had the pleasure of meeting Kory Clarke at KMKF-FM 101.5 before the show. He's probably the nicest guy I've ever met. I think Anderson should have listened to his interview on 101.5. Warrior Soul is a very political band. Plus, Clarke comes from New York City where people are a lot more liberal in their views of everything. Maybe you don't agree with his views, but don't use your difference of opinion as an excuse for unfair accusations and attacks of character.

C'mon, step into my living room

STEFFANY CARREL

The Questions:

1. Is Chevy really better than Ford?
2. What planet is David Duke from anyway, and why was he sent here?
3. Are there really any cranberries in that mummified, congealed can of cranberry sauce?
4. Is John Sununu really any worse than the rest of those Washington, D.C., folk?
5. Would there even be a recession if they just stopped saying there was?
6. How much turkey can one safely ingest within a 72-hour span?
7. Does power have to corrupt?
8. What's the point behind decaffeinated coffee?
9. Why won't George Bush just GO AWAY?

Folks, you have now entered the land of limited sight and unending sound, where time has little to no meaning, and space is the measure between George Bush's ears. You have entered (da da da) the Steffany Zone.

Come with me now as we delve deep — deeper — deeper — ouch! — into the depths of Steffany's questioning mind.

We'll enter through her left ear so as not the disturb the sleeping Steffany. Now let us slip silently behind the ear drum and right past her cerebrum.

Shhh! Don't scuff your feet so! She could wake up, and our whole show would be ruined. Rating points would go down the drain.

OK, now we've fully entered the brain. Lord, it's crowded in here.

Don't touch that cage. Those are her sexual inhibitions. Break those, and we'll have a raving lunatic. We wouldn't want that, now would we?

Hmmmm. Just look around now. Careful not to touch anything.

There! Ahead! Behind those crates of "Idealistic Rubbish" and right next to her "Naivete Shelves."

Don't you see? It's right between her "Simple Outlook" and that "Wake Up and Think Crap" she spews out at you weekly. Are you blind? Look!

Now you see the beginning. In the very center, it's the box that makes the Steffany Zone what it is.

And can you read the label on the shoe box there against the wall? Can you?

Wait. I think I can. It says in small deliberate letters — youth.

Well — there we have it. Now we know how it works.

What's that you say?

It's that same youth that makes the Steffany Zone so silly — so stupid?

You say it's that youth that makes it so idealistic — so far from reality?

I see. Well, I think it's time we leave. Try not to leave footprints — they damage the creative processes, you know. Some things just don't belong here. They taint the atmosphere.

Now, as we pass behind Steffany's eyes, we imagine what the world must look like through them. The world she sees through her sacred youth must be very bright indeed.

Of course, you already know that youth keeps one idealistic and hopeful. It's only when you surrender youth that bitterness and resentment come along. They replace idealism with the so-called "realities" of a cold and hard world.

Whelp, folks, quite honestly, I prefer youth. It may be simple, and it may be optimistic, but as far as I'm concerned, life should be as simple and bright as possible. And it damn well beats living life in drudgery and regret.

Well, we're almost out. Step carefully around this last turn in the road.

Oh, look, everyone — the answers to those questions. Tucked away here in the corner.

One final glance now, folks, as we depart from the Steffany Zone.

The Answers:

1. Ford is definitely better.
2. Duke is a virus, mutating and breeding. He was sent from Uranus as a punishment to those "unnatural" heterosexuals.
3. No cranberries — only melted earthworms.
4. Sununu's no worse— he just doesn't hide his obnoxiousness as well as the rest of them.
5. The recession is just a socialist plot.
6. Two pounds.
7. Always.
8. There is no point.
9. I don't know, but anyone who does should definitely get in touch with me. Immediately.

Holidays lonely for some

Counseling best to treat depression; signs include fatigue, guilt, appetite changes

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

A season that is supposed to mean giving and receiving, time with friends and family and holiday cheer can mean depression for some people.

HEALTH

"Our calls definitely escalate during the winter months, especially around Christmas," said Andrea, associate coordinator of the FONE crisis center. FONE does not release the last names of those who provide counseling. "People feel lonely during this time of the year. They think they don't have anyone to spend time with."

Depression is usually a byproduct of stress, which can come in various forms such as death of a spouse or loved one, divorce, poor health or trouble with school, she said.

"There are eight signs of severe depression: fatigue, changes in sleep patterns, difficulty concentrating, changes in appetite, a slow-down of the body's systems, loss of interest in things that used to be important, extreme feelings of guilt and thoughts of suicide," John Robertson, psychologist for University Counseling Services said. "A person experiencing five or six of these feelings for a period of several weeks is probably suffering from severe depression."

Clinical depression, however, is a disease.

"It is considered a disability by insurance companies," said Leon Rappoport, professor in psychology. "You can collect insurance to pay for treatment of depression."

Robertson said, "Being depressed or feeling a sense of hopelessness is not uncommon, but it can still be very dangerous, with suicide being a worst-case scenario."

People suffering from depression, especially if it is severe, should seek some type of counseling, Robertson said. FONE crisis center volunteers have sources of help available for callers.

"It depends on the individual call, but I'd say we refer almost every caller to someone else for counseling. We are a crisis intervention service," she said. "We do a lot of what I call high-powered listening, and sometimes that's all they need."

Robertson and Rappoport said they agreed that counseling is one of the best methods of getting help.

The other solution is anti-depressant drugs.

"When someone is feeling severely depressed, their biochemistry is off and medication can be a helpful solution," Robertson said. "It's like if your car is off the road and stuck in a ditch, and you keep pressing the accelerator and turning the wheel — you're not going to get the car out of the ditch. Medication can help you get your car back on the road so you can drive again."

Research from the National Institute of Health shows that severe depression is most effectively treated by a combination of medication and talk therapy.

"Not every case needs medication, but if you're not able to meet your daily required activities, you probably need it," Robertson said.

Students who think they are depressed can call University Counseling Services located in Lafene Health Center.

"I think the key element in dealing with depression is sharing your feelings with someone else," Rappoport said. "Support groups are especially helpful."

Company patents graduates' design

Suspension system created for class project

By the Collegian Staff

A routine assignment earned three K-State graduates a patent.

The 1988 graduates with degrees in engineering technology are John Petry, John Renner and Steve Palmateer.

The three and Fred Hoppe, professor of engineering technology, invented a new design for the suspension system of a yard tractor.

The idea for the design was initiated by Hoppe. He made arrangements with Collins Industries of Hutchinson for students in the capstone course in engineering technology to design for the company. An assignment for a suspension system was given to students, and they divided up in groups and went to work.

Hoppe said the outcome resulting in a patent is rare.

"The department is 15 years old, and it's the first patent, so it's a bit unique," he said. "A company won't get something patented unless it will help them make money."

The new patent will help Collins Industries make money. Capacity of Texas, a branch of Collins specializing in yard tractors, is one of the largest manufacturers of specialty vehicles in the world. The yard tractors are carriers used in shipping yards and docks.

The new suspension system, "Dura-ride," developed by the K-State students saves money through reduced maintenance, less time to raise and lower objects, increased productivity and improved driver comfort.

Palmateer said their work would indeed save money.

"It's a good opportunity for Collins Industries to pick up some cheap labor and extra skill, and it gives students a look at the real world," Palmateer said.

The patent has become a reality nearly two and a half years after Palmateer, Renner and Petry finished the project in college.

"I'd hear from Collins, but it takes a long time to go through the courts," Palmateer said. "We knew it was a possibility."

The inventors received copies of the patent, and the engineering technology department was given $5,000. Don Collins Jr., president of Collins Industries, presented the donation to the department.

Hoppe said the donation will most likely be used for computers.

Bulimia daily battle for some women

Eating disorder often caused by stress, low self-esteem

EMILY JOHNSON
A&E Writer

EDITOR'S NOTE: The subject of the following story wished to remain anonymous due to the social stigma placed on bulimics and people with diseases. Shelly is a fictitious name.

HEALTH

Shelly remembers the first time she made herself throw up.

"I was dieting and losing weight," she said. "My mom had just made fudge, and I told myself I could have one piece. Then I felt like I had to have another, but after that, panic hit.

"I had to get rid of the food. I started to think of all the books I had read in the past month about girls sticking their fingers down their throats and got rid of the food. From that point on, it became an easy solution for me."

Shelly is a sophomore honors student in pre-medicine. But for the past five years, Shelly has been battling an eating disorder — bulimia.

Cindy Burke, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center, said 25 percent of college women suffer from an eating disorder.

"I would even go a little further and venture that the statistic is higher because so many cases go unreported," Burke said.

Often called the binge-purge syndrome, bulimia is prevalent in women and men of all ages. One of the problems with helping bulimics is being able to recognize them.

"A person can be heavy and still be bulimic," said Burke. "Bulimics hide their disorders very well. They become very good liars, too."

Carole Hackerott, instructor of basic nutrition, said there are several signs people can look for if they suspect a friend is bulimic. Some of the symptoms she suggests looking for are puffy cheeks, weight fluctuation, fear of overeating, disappearing after meals, scarred knuckles from drawing the hand out of the mouth and bad breath.

The causes of eating disorders like bulimia are numerous. Shelly said her disorder stemmed from a lack of self-esteem.

"I was always the 'last-one-picked-for-the-team' type of girl," she said. "I knew I liked to read, so instead of hanging out with my friends, I read books. Then I started reading all about anorexia and bulimia. Instead of seeing how stupid it all was, I thought it was a great idea. I could starve myself or eat and throw up."

Shelly said bulimia became an obsession as time went by.

"My whole life centered around eating," she said. "I couldn't control my eating, but I could control how I got rid of my food."

Burke said this type of obsessive-compulsive behavior is only a way of coping with real problems.

"It's very much a psychological problem," Burke said. "Then it becomes a physical problem."

Burke said one of the biggest problems bulimics and anorexics face is meeting the expectations of their parents and peers.

"People are human, and no matter how much education we have or how good of a career we have, we are always looking for some type of security or control method. That's where an eating disorder can take place," Burke said.

Hackerott said she thinks the increasing number of people with eating disorders is caused by society's high expectations of women today.

"Women wrap so much of their self-worth in image," Hackerott said. "You open a magazine and see 'Firm Thighs in Five Days' or 'Dressing for Success' and how to do our hair and makeup in order to be successful. It's all based on image."

Bulimia does not affect older women alone. According to Burke, the average age of females in in-patient therapy for eating disorders used to be 12-14. Today, the average age is 8-10.

The disease bulimia

- Eating disorders, including bulimia, afflict at least 25 percent of college women.
- Some symptoms of bulimia are:
  - Puffy cheeks
  - Weight fluctuation
  - Fear of overeating
  - Disappearing after meals
  - Scarred knuckles
  - Bad breath

Burke said a crisis often sets off an eating disorder. She also said this is why it is hard for a bulimic to ever get 100-percent better.

"It's like alcoholism. Once you learn that behavior and use it to deal with your problems, you always turn to it in a time of crisis," Burke said. "A person needs counseling and help for them to learn to deal with their problems in another manner than with food."

Shelly said, "When I was confronted by my parents about my eating disorder, I said I would quit. But that's like getting a smoker to stop smoking. I was just so caught up in the same old pattern of eating and throwing up, I just couldn't quit."

After her friend caught her throwing up after a meal, Shelly said her friend told her parents.

"My mom went crazy," Shelly said. "My dad kept telling me I was smarter than this. He has a hard time relating to women."

Burke said confrontation is the hardest, yet most crucial, part of helping someone with an eating disorder.

"If you know someone with a problem, educate yourself first before confronting the person," Burke said. "You can't just say, 'All you have to do is eat.' It's not that easy. If you approach the person the wrong way, they will fight you, reject you and lie to you."

Burke suggested offering the person education about the resources at Lafene. Approaching the person with a concerned attitude and offering the friend assistance in getting help is the best way to start helping a person with an eating disorder.

"You should approach them by saying, 'I've seen what you're doing. Do you want to talk about it?'" Hackerott said. "You can't be negative, but if you tell them you know, it's harder for them to deny the eating disorder."

Lafene offers several personal and group counseling programs. A support group meets from 4 to 5 p.m. each Wednesday, and it is open to anyone with a disorder or anyone who wants to help a friend with a disorder.

The groups give an educational aspect to eating disorders and offer coping skills for people who use eating disorders to deal with their problems.

Therapy groups at Lafene offer a closed group that works with a counselor. University Counseling Services also offers one-on-one counseling with a therapist.

Burke said the complications of an eating disorder can be serious and life threatening if an individual doesn't get help. Ulcers on the esophagus caused by stomach acid; loss of enamel on the teeth; and damage to the kidneys, liver, intestines, lungs and heart are all complications associated with bulimia.

an hour.

"We were going about 20 mph," she said. "It was really frustrating."

McAdams had driven up state Highway 77 to I-70, where police at the on-ramp to the interstate were stopping cars from entering the highway.

"Police cars were everywhere, and no one could get through," she said.

The sheriff's department said the accidents began when someone had a flat tire in the one-lane section of the interstate, and other drivers weren't paying enough attention.

The first call on the accident came in around 5:15 p.m., the sheriff's department said. The highway was not open, and traffic was not flowing smoothly, until almost 8 p.m.

Smith said police were rerouting traffic through Junction City, but even that route was crowded and moving slowly. Cars were also trying to get on the interstate from other roads, she said.

Mistake-prone Cats hold off Missouri-Rolla

Division II foe gives K-State plenty of trouble

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Pretty?

Not.

K-State came out as flat as the proverbial pancake Monday night and narrowly avoided an upset at the hands of Division II Missouri-Rolla.

The 90-78 win before the smallest crowd ever for a game in Bramlage Coliseum — 5,883 — left Wildcat coach Dana Altman shaking his head in disgust during much of the post-game press conference.

"In all due respect to Missouri-Rolla ... I just thought defensively we would get up and play," Altman said.

The Cats didn't, however, and the visitors were within six, 84-78, with 53 seconds left. The narrow margin was a bit puzzling in that the Miners shot a less-than-dazzling 37.8 percent from the floor.

"It was hard to tell from our performance tonight whether they were hard to guard or not," Altman said of the Miner offensive showing.

For Deryl Cunningham, who registered a double-double with 12 points and 13 rebounds, K-State's defensive woes were rather simple to dissect.

"We didn't come out and play hard as a team," he said. "It's just a matter of getting five guys to come out and play hard at one time.

"If that doesn't happen, you're in trouble. If one guy is off, the whole team is off."

That out-of-synch feeling almost spelled disaster for the Cats.

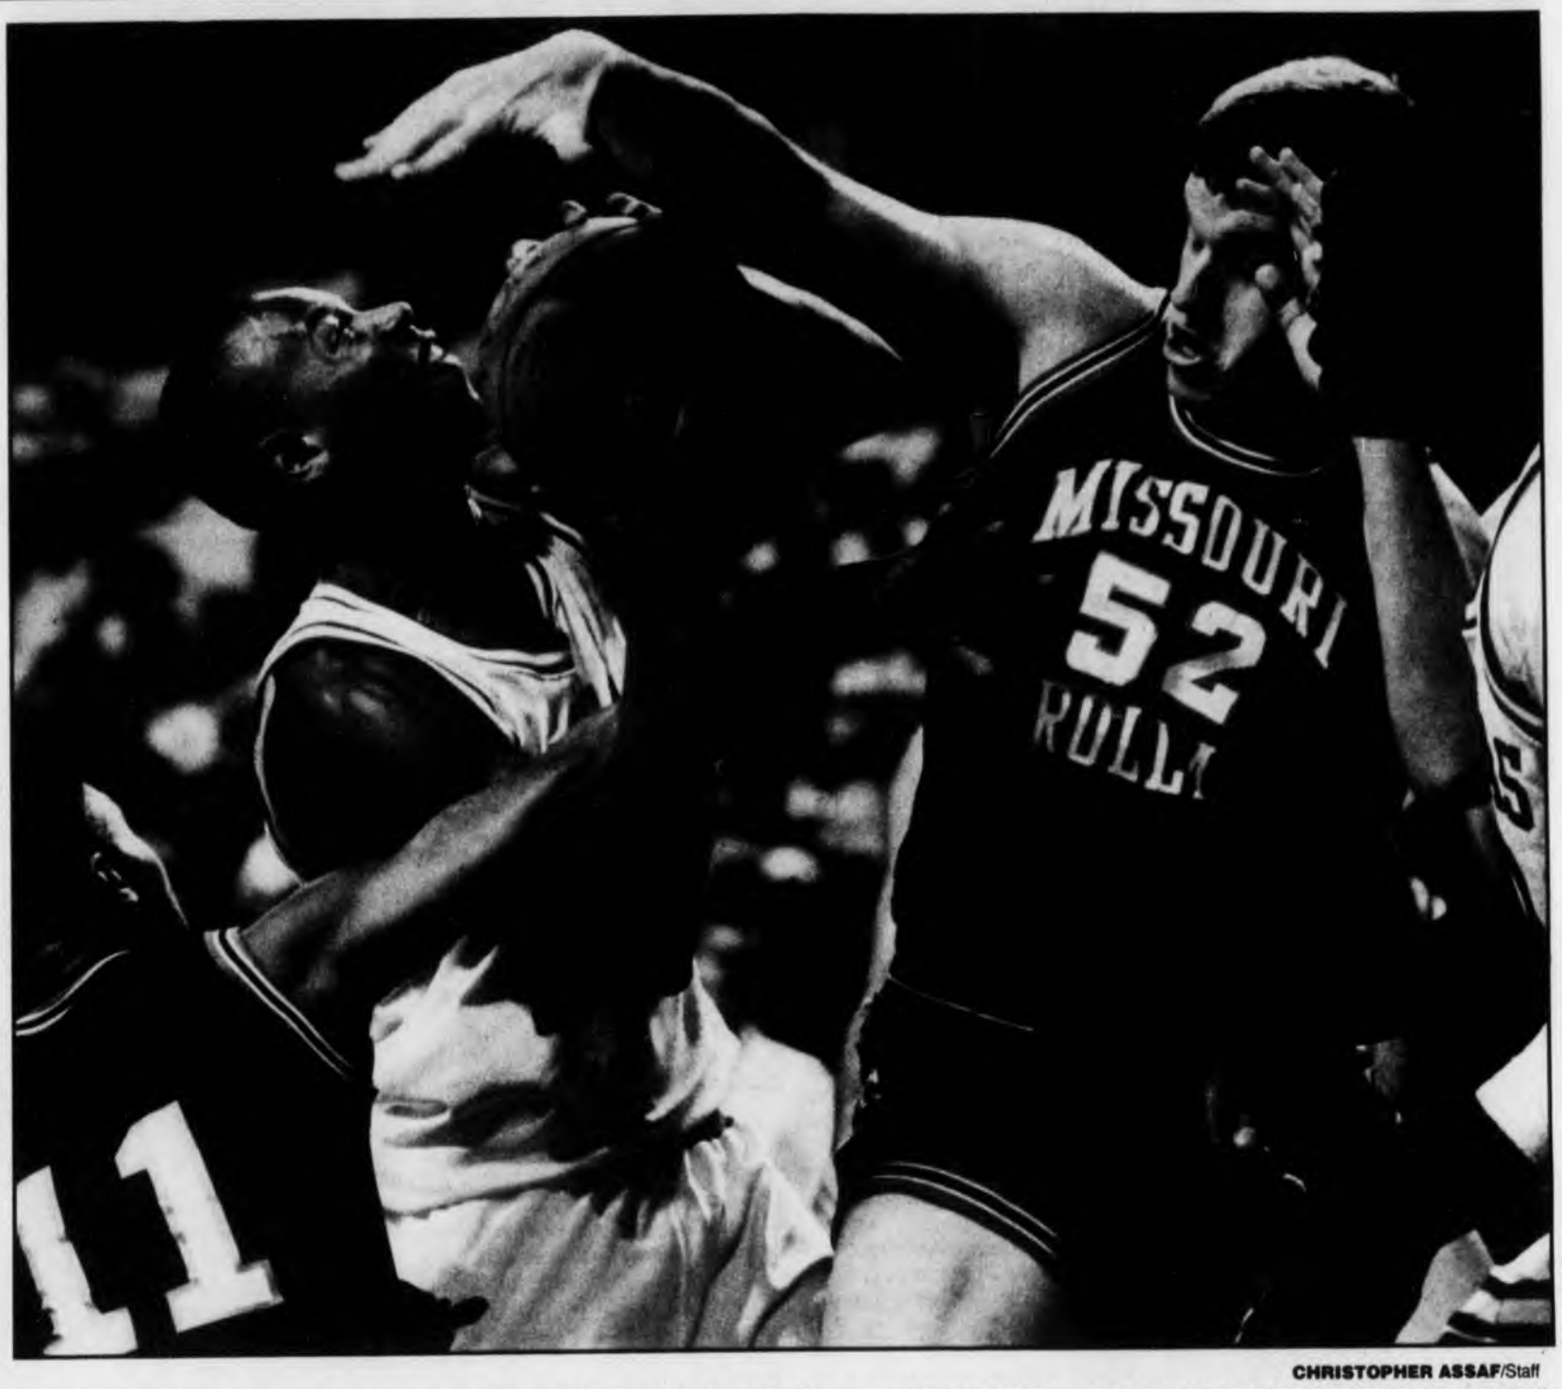
"You can't underestimate anybody," said Ski Jones, who had 15 points and knocked down two 3-pointers. "Whether it's a Division II team, or a Division IV or Division V school."

Though Division IV and Division V don't exist, Jones' point was well-taken. Altman was so dismayed by what he saw he was hesitant to give anyone credit for having played well.

"I don't think so," Altman responded when asked if any K-State player had put together a solid performance. "I'm not sure. I'd have to look at the film again."

If Altman decides to take a second look at the videotape — rather than trash it — what he'll see is his team out-rebounding its opponent by 21, only to turn the ball over an alarming 22 times.

Yuck.



"We were rushed — before shots and while taking them," Jones said. "I know I rushed a lot of things. I rushed shots. Once people caught it, they were in too much of a hurry to get something done quick."

Altman concurred.

"We missed a lot of open jumpers in the first half," Altman said of K-State's 17-of-42 showing in the opening 20 minutes. "We're a better shooting ball club than that."

Rolla hung tough from the get-go, using the hot shooting of play-making guard Bill Jolly to be within eight, 49-41, at intermission.

Miners pleased with effort

Jolly's shooting keeps upset hopes alive until the end

TODD FERTIG

A 90-78 victory over Missouri is something to be celebrated in the streets of Aggieville.

Such a win over Division II Missouri-Rolla, however, is a somewhat different story.

The Miners caught K-State completely by surprise, though they entered the contest with a 4-0 mark and a pair of season-opening tournament titles. The wide-open running style of the Miners gave the host Wildcats fits until the final minute.

The win left K-State players and coaches wondering what went wrong, while the visitors were upbeat. Missouri-Rolla coach Dale Martin joked with officials down the stretch and praised his squad for its effort.

"I think we gave them more than just a scrimmage," Martin said. "It came down to they were just too strong on the boards and had just a little too much down the stretch. But this team played very well, and I'm very proud of them."

K-State coach Dana Altman acknowledged the quality of the Division II opponent, but did not hesitate to keep the blame for such a close contest in the home team's locker room.

"In all due respect for Missouri-Rolla, I just thought defensively we would get up to play," Altman said. "They've got some players who are quick and take the ball to the basket, but in the first half we were just reaching and not moving."

Altman said the offense seemed to be "in a daze." K-State's 22 turnovers and poor shooting were a result of lack of concentration, he said.

"We had guys coming down and dribbling the ball off their foot," Altman said. "It's hard to tell if they really played that well, or if we just did it to ourselves."

Martin said the Division II label is misleading. He said he thought K-State may not have expected such a stiff challenge.

"I don't think many people outside of Missouri understand how tough our league is," Martin said. "We don't have quite the size that the Big Eight or any of the major conferences have, but we do have very good athletes."

Their aggressive style, coupled with the Cats' poor offensive execution, allowed Missouri-Rolla to hang close despite 37.8 percent shooting from the field. Feeling no pressure against the favored Division I team, the Miners took every shot the Cats gave them, and then some.

Bill Jolly, who led the team coming in with a 29-point scoring average and MVP honors from both tournaments, forced up 24 shots netted 22 points to lead all scorers. His 18-footer with 53 seconds remaining pulled the Miners to within six points, but the Cats ran off the final eight points to put the game away.

"We didn't play above our heads at all," Jolly said. "We knew we could play with them if we played our game. We knew we could run with them and that we had the quickness we needed to stay with them."

Jolly said he thought the Cats became more tentative after the Miners showed they were for real.

"I'm sure they were somewhat surprised," he said. "I think we opened some eyes tonight. They stiffened up after we came out and didn't back down from anything they threw at us."

Bonilla almost a Met

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bobby Bonilla, the top available free agent of the off-season, appeared Monday night to be closing in on a contract with the New York Mets.

A source in the Mets organization, speaking on condition of anonymity, said New York believed it was nearing the completion of a deal with the 28-year-old outfielder. Bonilla's agent, Dennis Gilbert, had been negotiating throughout the day with the Mets and the Philadelphia Phillies.

However, sources close to the team and Gilbert said the deal had not yet been closed. Gilbert could not be reached.

Phillies president Bill Giles said Monday night he had not had any contact with Gilbert during the evening.

Mets spokesman Jay Horwitz said New York general manager Al Harazin had been speaking periodically starting at 4:30 p.m.

"They're on the telephone, faxing things back on forth," Horwitz said late Monday night. "They're still talking."

California had been the third team thought to be involved in the late stages of negotiations, but Angels spokesman Tim Mead said Monday night no talks were going on between the team and Gilbert. In addition, the Angels' flagship station, KMPC, reported an unidentified Angels executive said it appeared Bonilla would sign with the Mets.

Lady Cats in search of a little help

Oral Roberts completes matchup of struggling teams

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

On the side of the basketball floor at Oral Roberts University in Tulsa, Okla., is written a simple statement: "Expect a miracle."

That's just what the ORU women's basketball team and K-State will be seeking tonight at 7 in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Lady Cats would appear to need the divine intervention worse than their opposition from the south.

K-State is 0-2 to open the year, having dropped an overtime contest in its opener and a 20-point decision in the home opener Saturday.

The Titans are 1-3, having dented the win column against the University of Texas-El Paso in the second game of the year. ORU finished fourth in last weekend's Wimmer's Classic at the University of Nebraska, falling to Rice and Grambling State.

These, then, are a pair of teams looking for the touch of a healing hand.

"We can't go into the tank now," K-State coach Susan Yow said after her team fell 77-57 on Saturday to Creighton. "Experience can change things a lot. We will improve."

K-State needs a player to take charge of the team offensively, Yow said, and a chemistry that will allow the unit to make that ever-so-big "next step."

"We don't have a lot of chemistry right now," she said. "When we come down, we don't act like we know where are shots are going to come from."

France enjoys Davis Cup title

PARIS (AP) — Unforgettable!

That was the headline across the front of France's sports daily Monday as the nation savored one of its sweetest sporting triumphs, the emotional upset of the United States in the Davis Cup final.

The heroes — Guy Forget, Henri Leconte and captain Yannick Noah — were still partying in a Lyon night club at 3 a.m., nine hours after Forget's defeat of Pete Sampras enabled France to claim the Cup for the first time in 59 years.

As they celebrated, virtually every newspaper in France was coming off the presses with their exploits splashed across the front page. Even the staid Le Monde, which often omits sports coverage altogether, had a front-page story and a full-page spread on the back page, including a dispatch from Washington, D.C., reporting that the final had received little attention in the United States.

There was Forget, solidly established as the world's No. 7 player, but seemingly stuck with a reputation for falling short in crucial matches. That reputation endured through his loss to Andre Agassi in the opening match Friday, but was erased perhaps forever on Sunday when he beat Sampras with booming aces on several of the most nerve-wracking points.

Former assistant returns

Johnson to work at K-State in College of Veterinary Medicine as part of settlement

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

A former assistant to the K-State president will return to work at K-State in the College of Veterinary Medicine as part of a settlement of a lawsuit against the University.

Mike Johnson was the assistant to the president from December 1979 to July 1988. He was then transferred to the Division of Continuing Education where he worked until his employment was terminated in July 1990.

Johnson filed suit against the University for firing him before his contract was over.

He said he was fired because he ran in the 1988 Kansas Senate election and was told someone who ran for political office could no longer be the University's legislative liaison.

"The termination came quite some time after the election," Johnson said.

He had also served in the Kansas House of Representatives in the 1970s as a representative for the 63rd district.

Assistant University Attorney Dorothy Thompson said the settlement was finalized last week. Johnson will be a part-time instructor in the veterinary dentistry program next semester.

In addition to putting together a veterinary dentistry program, Johnson said he will be working in the small animal clinic and will help with a senior seminar clinic.

Johnson said he was satisfied with the settlement.

"We wouldn't have settled if both parties weren't satisfied," he said.

Johnson is a dentist in Abilene and said he will continue his practice when he returns to work for the University.

"I want to stay in dentistry," he said. "We all need new challenges, and I think it's going to be a great one.

"It's a great opportunity for both the University and myself," he said.

Johnson said although he had to file suit against the University to settle the matter, he is looking forward to returning to K-State.

"I've got a lot of purple running through me," he said. "It's a great university, and I'm anxious to get started."

Facilities opts to give back janitorial money

80 percent to be refunded to maintain floors, services

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

Students and faculty won't be walking on worn-down floors next semester as was once expected.

Janitorial services' budget was cut $50,000 this June, but the Division of Facilities has opted to refund at least $40,000 of the cutback, beginning in January, in order to maintain the five million square feet of floors and other services the division provides.

The cut was to affect supplies only, but that meant when certain supplies ran out, no more would be purchased, said Alvin Seely, physical plant supervisor. This probably wouldn't happen until the second half of the fiscal year, he said.

The department would have had to eliminate floor refinishing, carpet cleaning and window washing and would have no longer been able to provide trash can liners, Seely said. Sanitation, however, would have remained unchanged.

In the past, about $30,000 was spent maintaining floors. The main concern, Seely said, was loose and cracking tile in old floors.

"Without maintenance, they wouldn't look very good, and they would deteriorate quickly," Seely said.

Though the exact amount to be refunded has not yet been determined, Ed Rice, assistant vice president of physical facilities, has approved the purchase of $40,000 of floor refurbishing products and other supplies.

Vice President for Administration and Finance Tom Rawson said the money is available because the University planned for a mid-year state budget cut of 2 percent, and only 1 percent was actually cut.

"The gravel used for the early snowstorm is tracked into the buildings and tearing up the floors," Rice said.

The division usually refinishes the floors three times per year at a cost of $30,000, he said.

Seely said, "We voiced our concern from June when we were notified until they gave the money back."

Expecting at least $40,000, Seely has planned to continue floor maintenance and cut out window cleaning in the summer semester.

"If we're careful, you won't notice anything different except dirty windows during the summer," Seely said.

ISEP offers K-State cultural feeling

Students from other countries participate one to one in exchange

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

The campus has a distinct cultural feeling this year as 18 students from other countries study through the International Student Exchange Program.

The program is based on a one-to-one exchange in which a student from the United States trades places with a student from another country.

Each student pays for tuition, fees, room and board, thereby setting up a situation for the incoming student.

K-State ISEP Director Walter Kolonosky, associate professor of modern languages, said foreign students do well at K-State because many have been speaking English since primary school and want the opportunity to use it more.

"If your language skills are at a certain point, the next logical step is to study abroad," Kolonosky said. "You really need to be around people who speak it to improve."

The students studying at K-State this year come from countries such as France, Russia and the Netherlands. Many have been here only since the beginning of the school year.

Eric Berbain, non-degree undergraduate in business administration, came to K-State from Savoire, France, to study business. Although he already has a degree from the University of Savoire in environmental science, he said he feels the courses here will help him in the future.

"I am taking business courses in case I ever own my own business someday," Berbain said. "I also wanted to know English better before I started working."

Berbain said he had trouble with the language at first, but after being here a month, he understands it much better.

"Except when I watch TV, sometimes that is very hard to understand," he said.

International students get acquainted fairly well because they are all in a foreign country with few contacts.

Kolonosky had a reception at his house at the beginning of the semester to introduce the students to one another. They exchanged phone numbers so they could help each other when needed, but they still try to meet as many Americans as possible.

Cecile Cholat, non-degree undergraduate in arts and sciences and exchange student from Savoire, France, said it is initially difficult to get to know Americans.

"They are friendly, but not as open to real relationships as people in some places of the world," he said. "But I requested an American roommate because I want to learn about the culture."

The French students agree American education is much different than theirs.

In France, they must pass a comprehensive test, called the baccalaureate, after high school so they can proceed to college.

College consists of several degrees. The first is earned after two years of study, and the rest are earned year by year. Students can earn up to four degrees if they choose to stay in school.

"It is different, but the education is very good over here," Cholat said. "Teachers require more homework and participation, while in France, we work at our own pace."

Cholat also said it is not unusual for French students to take 25-30 hours a week.

K-State has been participating in the exchange program in 1986 and has since sent and received 136 students.

Throckmorton expansion planned for April

Government gives $21.4 million for construction

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

The federal and state governments have appropriated $21.4 million for the expansion of Throckmorton Hall scheduled to begin spring semester.

Vincent Cool, associate director of facilities planning, said the entire cost of the expansion will be $24.7 million.

"The expansion is almost completely funded right now," Cool said. "The remaining money needed will be used to furnish the building once it has been built."

Cool said documents concerning the expansion have been sent out to construction companies and said he hopes to receive bids by mid-January.

"I hope we can start construction by April, but it will all depend on what the weather is like," he said.

Lee McQueen, director of architecture and engineering services, said the expansion will be built to the east and west of the existing Throckmorton building.

McQueen said the Hollis House, located to the west of Throckmorton, will have to be torn down in the process of expansion.

Dedicated in 1970, the Hollis House once housed the KSU Foundation and alumni offices until it moved to the former Farm Bureau building in April 1991. Since April, the utilities have been turned off, and the house has remained empty.

Cool said the expansion will be about the same size as the existing building and will be four stories high.

The new addition will cover over 95,000 square feet, he said, and will house areas for research and offices for the existing departments.

In the opening stanza, Jolly had 16 of his game-high 22 points, with nine of them coming from the foul line.

After seemingly regrouping at the half, K-State moved to a 13-point, 58-45 lead when Gaylon Nickerson scored inside with 15:38 left.

But the Miners scratched and clawed their way back, going on a 10-1 spurt over the next 3:25 to pull to within four at 59-55 when Chris Dawson scored from inside the paint.

The lead was in single digits much of the remainder of the game, with K-State grabbing a 12-point lead when Vincent Jackson, who had a team-high 17 points, rammed home a dunk with 1:51 left.

But the visitors, much like an unwelcome holiday guest, failed to go away, cutting it to the aforementioned six just 58 seconds later.

"It felt like it was close the whole game," Jones said in what may have been the understatement of the night.

"And it all comes down to the fact that the defense dictates the offense for us, and the defense didn't play very well tonight."

Altman said K-State's performance was predictable, based on a sluggish Sunday practice session.

Jones said those kind of practices and games will come. The secret, he said, is overcoming them and learning something from them.

"You're not going to have a crisp practice every time, and you're not going to have a great game every time," he said. "We need to come out and practice hard and work on eliminating the mental mistakes."

It was mental lapses that Cunningham pointed to as well.

"It was definitely more mental than anything," he said. "We give the effort, but some of us have a tendency to fade mentally. We don't give up, but we kind of check out every now and then."

It was admittedly lucky for K-State that Cunningham and mates checked out but didn't leave the Hotel Bramlage Monday night.

money for a focused outcome," Heavey said. "What we have is money chasing a plan, and what we need is a plan chasing the money."

It was argued the proposal would benefit K-State as well as Manhattan, being a good opportunity for improvement. The committee, however, agreed expenditures need to be more narrowly researched and priorities for taxing are a must.

Atina Hanna, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket and investigative committee member, said the tax proposal has a regressive nature, and it's not appropriate in this community.

"This kind of tax would place a burden on the end of the economic scale whose spending power is already limited," Hanna said.

"It would affect the pockets of people not only economically unable to support themselves, but also whose problems are Medicaid, no day care and lack of transportation."

Mayor Gene Klingler concluded the discussion by analyzing the committee's findings, and the majority had voted against enabling legislation.

"K-State is a major mainstay in the economy of Manhattan, but it appears we have the end product before the preliminary dance card," Klingler said.

"The idea isn't dead," City Commissioner Helen Cooper said. "Economically, it's not a good time for something like this, but a little more thought and focus could create it again."

manager at the Brazilian Court hotel, a palmy Spanish-style hideaway where another Kennedy cousin — David, son of Sen. Robert Kennedy — died of a drug overdose in 1984.

"Ordinarily, I think across the board you look at a slow season for everybody in December," Metzger said. "I think it's been very advantageous for all the hotels."

On Royal Poinsciana Way, the street whose several bars and restaurants figured in the Smith story in some way, merchants have flung themselves into the spirit of the trial.

Sprinkles Ice Cream parlor offers several "trial flavors" including Teddy's Best (with Chivas Regal) and Willie Vanilli. A couple doors down, a clothing store called Uptown Casuals displays T-shirts that depict a red-nosed, besotted-looking Ted Kennedy and a smirking Willie Smith in a frying pan.

The caption: "Hot Time in Palm Beach. Hot Trial."

Farther down the street, E.R. Bradley's Saloon, a raucous pickup bar where Smith and Patrick Kennedy reportedly drank earlier the night of the incident, planned a "Pre-trial Madness Party" Sunday night. Manager Mitch Reilly said the party was intended to cater to the media.

He shuffled through a sheaf of business cards that included, among others, one from The Times of London. Fleet Street, he said, was well-represented at a back table.

Across the street at Au Bar, the preppie disco where Smith met his accuser, manager Francis Toubel said the Smith case had helped make his business a success.

Toubel said he hadn't heard much talk about the case lately at Au Bar, where talk is difficult to hear over the relentless blast of dance music. But a visitor very early Sunday morning was accosted twice by women who wanted to talk about the trial, both anonymously.

the Ukraine's 37.5 million eligible borders turned out Sunday and 90 percent of them voted "yes" on the independence referendum, the Central Election Commission reported.

Gorbachev made no immediate comment. He had said before the election that the secession of the second richest republic would be "a tragedy, a very great tragedy for the union."

Ivan Silayev, the Kremlin's top economic official, said the result of the referendum depended upon "what steps are taken next."

Kravchuk and other Ukrainian leaders said the vote marked the complete independence of the Ukraine and no other acts were needed for it to join the three Baltic states as the only republics to break completely from the Soviet Union.

Cicippio was captured by the Iranian-allied Revolutionary Justice group on Sept. 12, 1986.

Steen, 52, a native of Boston, was seized with three fellow educators at Beirut University College on Jan. 24, 1987, by the pro-Iranian Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine. The others were freed earlier.

Tuesday's communique that Steen would be freed was authenticated by an instant color photograph of the communications professor.

The communique said, "We shall release the American Steen within 48 hours."

Cicippio, asked how he felt as he reached the hospital, replied, "Terrific tonight, great."

A sign above the hospital entrance read: "Welcome home, Mr. Cicippio." Blue and white balloons decorated the front railing, and the steps were flanked by two American flags.

"Thank you all for coming out so late at night," he added, speaking to about 100 people who greeted him at 11:15 p.m.

"As far as I know, all the visas will be granted today, but some people are still being considered," said Hanan Ashrawi, a spokesman for the Palestinian delegation.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Jonathan Owen declined to comment.

The United States generally bans entry of PLO officials, but has allowed some in on previous occasions.

Abdullah said the Palestinian delegation would fly to Washington with the Jordanian delegation aboard a government-chartered plane that delayed its departure until the Palestinians made a decision.

A senior member of the Jordanian delegation had said earlier that the Palestinian objections about PLO visas would not affect his delegation. Jordan's group "will surely travel to Washington as scheduled, even if the Palestinians balk," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Sununu resigns as chief of staff

Believes action in president's best interest, he said

By the Associated Press

MERIDIAN, Mississippi — White House Chief of Staff John Sununu resigned Tuesday after harsh criticism among Republicans of his abrasive style.

In a handwritten note Sununu told Bush that he thought it was in the president's best interest for him to resign.

Bush accepted the resignation, effective Dec. 15, and said that Sununu would remain as a counselor to the president with Cabinet rank through March 1.

The announcement ended weeks of speculation about Sununu's future. In his five-page letter, Sununu said that until recently he had been convinced that he could be a strong contributor to Bush's efforts.

But "politics, especially during the seasons of a political campaign, perceptions that can be effectively dealt with at other times can be — and will be — converted into real political negatives," Sununu wrote. "And I would never want to not be contributing positively, much less be a drag on your success." There was no immediate announcement of a successor. Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner has been mentioned prominently, though, as a replacement.

Sununu, 52, came to Washington as chief of staff right after Bush's election in November 1988. The portly New Hampshire governor had been widely credited with turning around Bush's presidential hopes by orchestrating a come-from-behind victory in that state's primary.

Sununu came to Washington with a reputation as a pit bull but proclaimed himself as a pussycat. He alluded to both characterizations as he left with an offer to always be of help to Bush.

"I assure you that in pit bull mode or pussycat mode (your choice, as always) I am ready to help," he wrote.

Bush's eldest son, George W. Bush, had warned Sununu that he had alienated many key Bush supporters who were urging he be replaced, sources said in Washington.

Right up until Sununu's resignation, the White House insisted that Bush has "full confidence" in his aide. But other officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said they doubted that Sununu would survive the latest controversy.

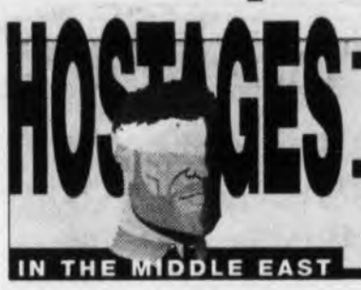
Administration and GOP officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the younger Bush, who has always been a key adviser to the president, had sounded out Republicans in Bush's inner circle over the past week.

He relayed his findings — which were mostly negative — to Sununu last Wednesday before the Bushes left the White House for a Thanksgiving weekend at the presidential retreat at Camp David, Md., the sources said.

"He (the young Bush) told him (Sununu) there was a problem," said one Republican source. The source said that George W. Bush was acting as a go-between at the specific request of his father.

Critics have blamed Sununu for some of the missteps and mixed signals the White House has sent out over the past weeks on dealing with the faltering economy. His often caustic style in dealing with other Republicans, even Cabinet members, has contributed to the calls for Sununu's resignation.

Earlier, Sununu was the subject of a White House ethics probe for his extensive use of government jets and limousines for personal and political travel.



Fitzwater said that Bush met with Sununu on Sunday in Washington after returning from Camp David and also had dinner with Skinner at the White House.

Fitzwater said he did not know what Bush and Skinner talked about.

Steen released by Lebanese captors

Anderson expected to be released today

By the Associated Press

- Alann Steen was released Tuesday after almost five years of captivity. Steen's release came one day after the release of Joseph Cicippio.
- Steen said his captors told him that Terry Anderson, the last American hostage in Lebanon, would be released "in about a week."

DAMASCUS, Syria — The Lebanon kidnapping ordeal seemed headed for an end with the release of another American on Tuesday, and reports said Terry Anderson, the last American captive, could be freed Wednesday.

The freeing of American Alann Steen was the latest in a series of dramatic releases since August that has been orchestrated by the United Nations. Only three Westerners still are held captive by Shiite Muslim radicals.

U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar, who had predicted Steen's release 24 hours earlier, said in New York after meeting with Iranian Ambassador Kamal Kharrazi that he expected yet another release within two days. "I know it will be very soon but I cannot say when," he added.

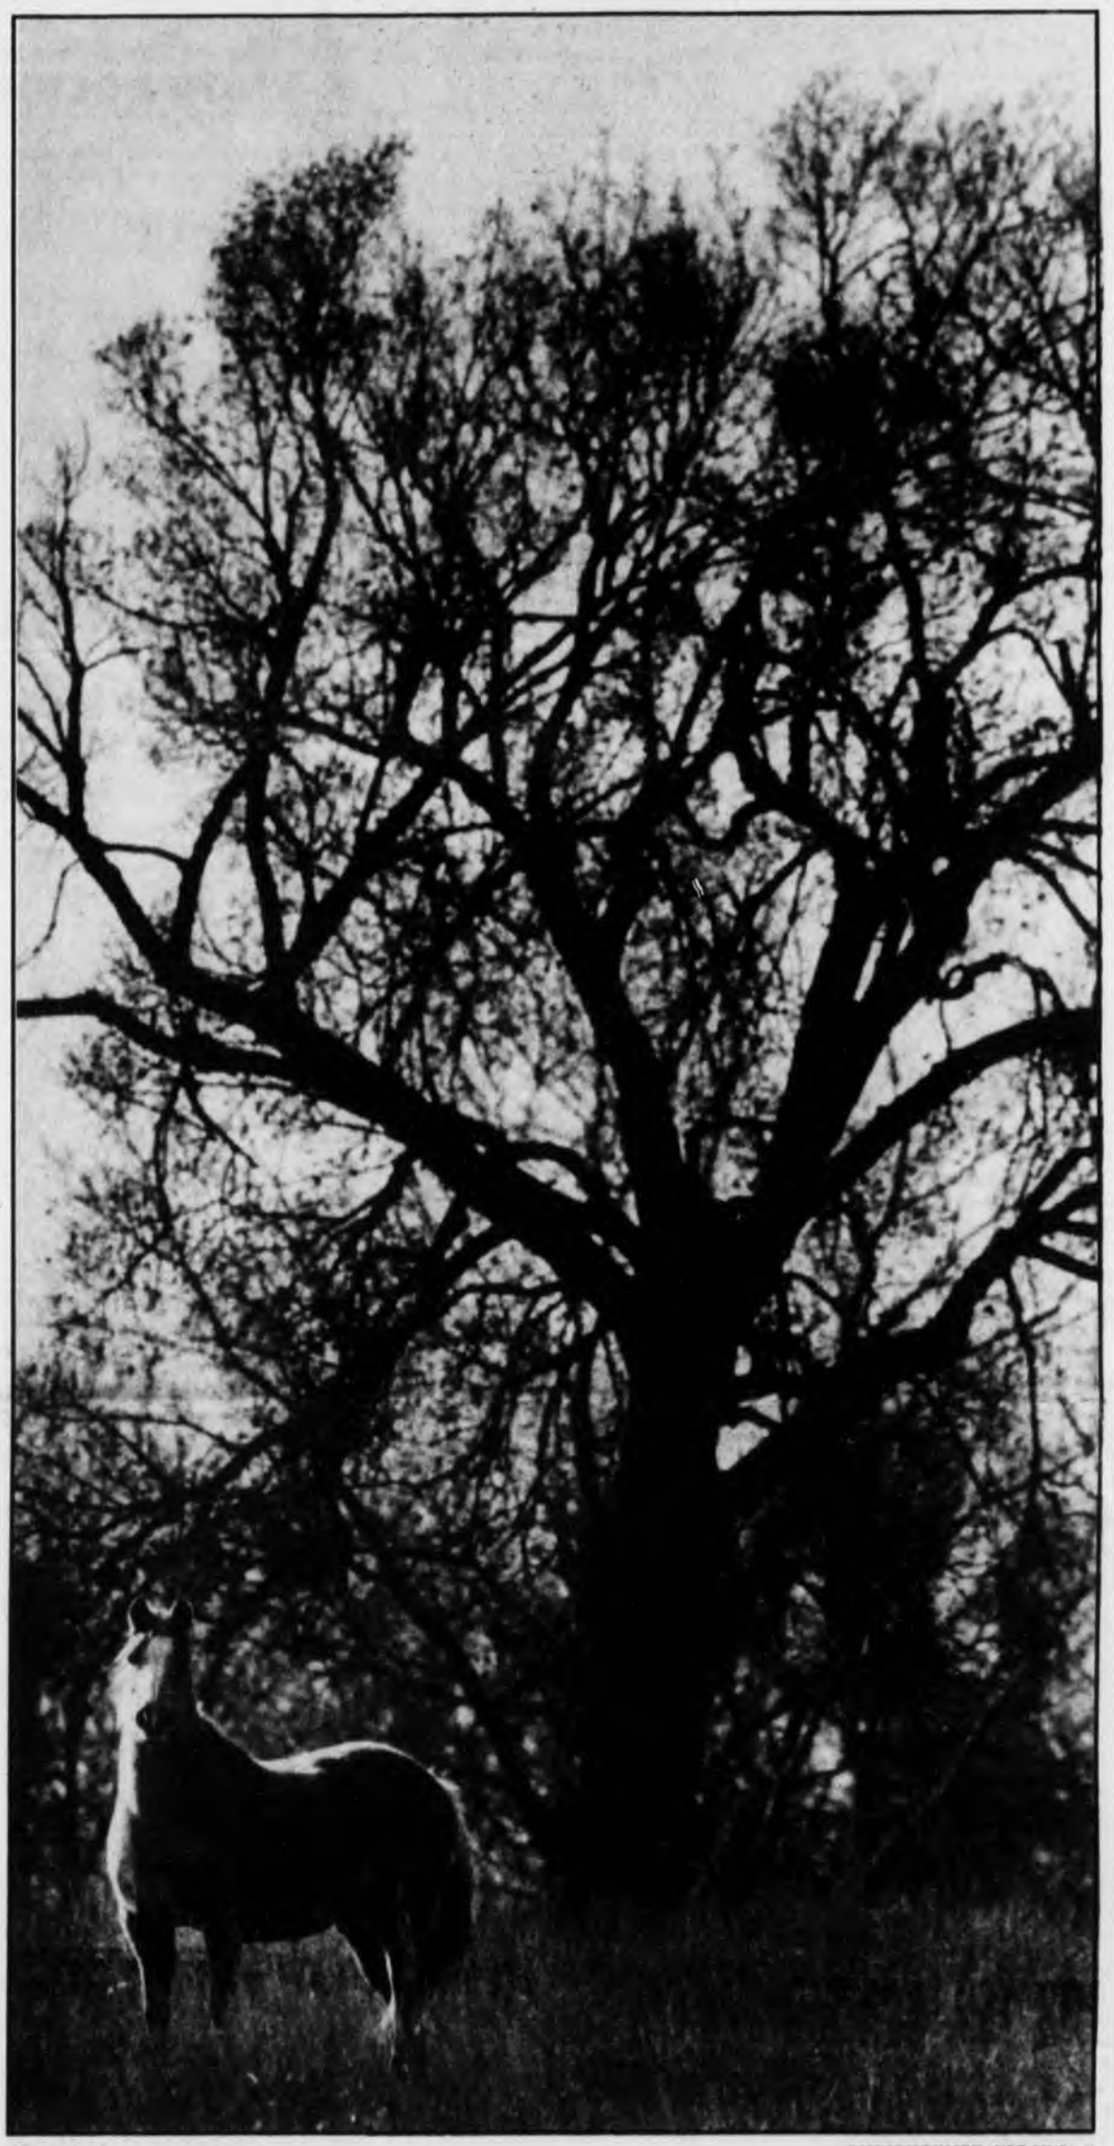
Kharrazi said it was his understanding that Anderson would be freed by Wednesday, and sources in Damascus who are close to the hostage negotiations made the same prediction. There were indications that the United Nations was working on a separate deal to gain the Germans' freedom.

Steen, a Boston native, spent nearly five years in captivity.

"It's great to be out," the 52-year-old journalism teacher told reporters at a news conference at the Syrian Foreign Ministry.

Steen, thin and pale, wept as he was turned over to U.S. Ambassador Christopher Ross.

"I don't think I can find the words right now to express how I feel, except that it's wonderful," said Steen, who was kidnapped on Jan. 24, 1987 at the U.S.-supported Beirut University College by extremists posing as Lebanese police. "Five years is no fun."



The pro-Iranian organization of Islamic Jihad for Liberation of Palestine said it freed Steen in Beirut under a U.N.-brokered agreement. Syrian army officers drove Steen across the rain-swept border to Damascus, the traditional first stop for freed hostages.

Steen was flown Tuesday night to Germany, where he will undergo medical examinations and be debriefed by intelligence officials.

Nearly 100 people turned out in subfreezing temperatures to greet Steen as he arrived at the U.S. Air Force hospital in Wiesbaden.

He punched his fist in the air in jubilation as confetti showered down

K-State's mission statement revised

New draft is more defined; looks into future of the University

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

K-State, along with all regents universities, has developed a new mission statement at the request of the Board of Regents.

K-STATE'S FUTURE

The current statement was written in 1986 by the regents. Provost James Coffman said the revision will define K-State's mission more broadly.

"It more clearly states the distinctive role a land-grant university has," Coffman said.

In addition, the new statement will emphasize teaching and research and looks more to the University's future, he said.

"It is everyone's intent that this will carry us into the next century," Coffman said.

President Jon Wefald said he agreed that the revision will focus on the long term.

"It allows us to be imaginative and visionary within the next 10-15 years," Wefald said.

Since last spring, people from all over campus have been contributing ideas toward the new statement, Coffman said.

The provost's office distributed copies of the most recent draft, written by the Ad Hoc Executive Committee of Strategic Planning, to all faculty and staff members and student government leaders Nov. 12.

They were asked to direct any comments or suggestions to their administrators by Nov. 22.

The draft mission statement deadline was Dec. 1, and the regents will meet Dec. 19 to discuss them.

Coffman said the ad hoc committee thought its draft was far enough along to share with the University because there is enough time to consider the input received and make any big changes.

Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education, said he thought the statement's look toward the future and its focus beyond the University were important improvements.

> "It is a mission statement that is very reflective of the priorities of this institution. Both in content and in spirit, it matches well with what the people of Kansas expect K-State to be for them."
> Michael Holen

"It is a mission statement that is very reflective of the priorities of this institution," Holen said. "Both in content and spirit, it matches well with what the people of Kansas expect K-State to be for them."

Though all the regents institutions are developing new statements, Coffman said the board is not trying to streamline the state's university system.

"You will be able to tell the institutions apart based on their mission statements," he said.

Coffman said having each school draft its own statement is better than the board deciding the mission of each.

"The board has to make the final judgment," he said. "But, certainly, this is a much better process."

According to the letter accompanying copies of the latest draft, the regents' mission-review initiative consists of developing a new regents mission statement and strategic themes; adopting broad, conceptual statements for each institution; and working on more specific "role and aspiration" statements for each university.

Coffman said a role and aspiration statement explains where the University currently stands, its goals and how it plans to attain them.

These will not be developed until the new mission statements are approved. Role and aspiration statement approval is probably another year away, he said.

Bramlage brings accessibility

Handicapped employee says changes not enough

DEDRA MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Efforts are being made to make Bramlage Coliseum more handicapped accessible.

Bramlage Director Charles Thomas said the coliseum meets safety codes, but Maureen Lockhart, a handicapped office specialist for the dean of engineering, said improvements could be made.

"I stopped going to anything that was at Bramlage, because I don't feel safe there," she said. "They have ushers to help you to your seats. I may be handicapped, but I still have pride."

Lockhart said she could help herself if there were more handrailings. There are currently handrails in the chairback section, which is directly opposite the section designated for students during basketball season.

Lockhart suggested several changes: more handrails, more lighting inside, better steps inside the coliseum, handrails for walking on the slopes outside and more seating for the handicapped.

Bramlage has four handicapped sections with special accommodations for safety and convenience.

"This year, we are going to try something different by making room on the floor for more visible seating," Thomas said.

Thomas said the complaint made about people standing up would be hard to solve.

"It would be impossible to get students to sit down at the basketball games and concerts," he said.

The way the building is designed makes it hard to find adequate seating for the handicapped without violating the safety codes, Thomas said.

"It doesn't matter if I sit with the students or not. I would feel safer on the floor," Lockhart said.

Gretchen Holden, director of educational personal programs, said the problem isn't unusual for many coliseums.

New U.N. secretary-general elected

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — The General Assembly on Tuesday formally elected Egyptian diplomat Butros Ghali as the world body's new secretary-general, and he pledged to tackle the debt and economic problems of the Third World.

Ghali, who helped work out Egypt's historic peace accord with Israel in 1979, was greeted with thunderous applause after being elected by acclamation and sworn in as secretary-general before the 166-nation assembly.

Egypt's deputy prime minister will begin his five-year term Jan. 1, succeeding Javier Perez de Cuellar, who toasted him with champagne at a reception. He is to return to Egypt in a few days and does not plan a U.N. news conference until he takes office.

Ghali, 69, will be the sixth U.N. secretary-general and the first Arab and African to hold the job of the world's top diplomat. The job pays $202,000 a year.

He assumes office at a time of unprecedented U.N. activity and renewed prestige for its peacekeeping and peacemaking efforts, as well as negotiations to free hostages in the Middle East.

Huet-Vaughn's sentence cut in half

FORT LEONARD WOOD, Mo. (AP) — Fort Leonard Wood's commanding general on Tuesday cut in half the 30-month confinement of an Army Reserve doctor who refused duty in Operation Desert Storm.

But Maj. Gen. Daniel Christman approved the verdict reached by a general court-martial against Capt. Yolanda Huet-Vaughn of Kansas City, Kan., who was convicted in August of desertion.

Huet-Vaughn, who voiced philosophical objections to the war against Iraq, began serving her sentence on Aug. 9 at the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth.

Christman reduced the sentence to 15 months but upheld Huet-Vaughn's dismissal from the service. The general also ordered the forfeiture of Huet-Vaughn's pay and allowances, effective Tuesday.

Reward set to catch locker room thief

LAWRENCE (AP) — A reward has been offered to help police catch the thief who ransacked the visitors' locker room during a University of Kansas basketball game.

Some of the items stolen have been recovered, authorities said Tuesday.

Campus police released a computer-generated composite picture of the thief who slipped into the Central Missouri State locker room Saturday night and stole more than $14,000 in cash and valuables near the end of the game.

Lt. John Mullens of the campus police department said the thief's description came from a Lawrence man who was found wearing a Central Missouri jacket Saturday night. The man, who was not arrested, told officers he bought the jacket and an athletic bag about an hour after the game from a man who approached him at a Lawrence car wash.

Mullens said a $500 reward for information leading to the arrest of a suspect was posted by a committee of faculty, staff and students that oversees the campus Crimestopper telephone program.

West Hall's visitation discussed by few

Only a few people showed up Tuesday night for the scheduled discussion of West Hall's 24-hour visitation policy, which went into effect earlier this semester.

Those who did attend the meeting said they didn't think the new policy had caused any problems.

"The 24-hour visitation policy was approved on a trial basis, that way if there were problems, it could be changed back," said Rita Hosie, West Hall president and junior in bakery science and management. "This discussion was to give a chance for people to talk about this policy."

Becky Bilson, freshman in hotel and restaurant management, said, "There hasn't been a big change on our floor since the change."

Three minor incidents have been reported since the visitation policy went into effect, but all happened during the daytime.

The visitation policy pros seem to outweigh the cons at West Hall, residents said.

Romancer or rapist; Smith trial begins

Contrasting depictions of encounter set tone

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — William Kennedy Smith listened solemnly Monday as a prosecutor depicted him as a cruel and vicious rapist and his attorney portrayed him as a man who made love to a willing woman in the moonlight.

The differing versions of the sexual encounter came after testimony began in the sensational trial of Sen. Edward Kennedy's nephew, accused of raping a woman at the Kennedy family estate.

Earlier Monday a judge decided not to let three other women testify about their claims that Smith had sexually assaulted them in the 1980s. The ruling served to deflate the prosecutor's efforts to show that Smith had a history of abusing women.

But Assistant State Attorney Moira Lasch said she would prove her case anyway.

"The evidence will demonstrate that the defendant's conduct was not only cruel, violent and against her will, it is was most importantly criminal under the laws of Florida," Lasch told the jury of four women and three men.

Defense lawyer Roy Black countered that what happened at the Kennedy estate last Easter weekend was a romantic encounter between two people attracted to each other.

"You will hear this was a consensual act of sexual intercourse," Black said.

He said Smith and the woman, who says she was raped, met at a bar, went to the estate, hugged and kissed in the car and went to the beach.

"They got into foreplay and they made love," said Black. "It was a totally consensual act of love between two people."

Lasch told of a woman lured to the Kennedy estate only to be raped and pursued by a "ferocious" young man who told her no one would believe her if she claimed rape.

"He was a famous, prominent person," said Lasch. "She was an unknown person." She said the woman feared that the police would take no action against the powerful Kennedys.

Black, however, said the woman made up the rape story after Smith acted "cold" after sex.

"She had expectations here that were not fulfilled," he said.

"One of the key issues in this case is credibility, honesty," he told the jury. "You have to determine if this allegation is true."

He said he would prove that the woman lied about many details.

"For the first time, we're not going to be tried by the newspapers in this case," said Black. "For the first time we're going to be able to say what happened. When you hear it, you will conclude that this young man is not guilty."

The trial began with a huge media contingent. Some 500 reporters had credentials to cover the case and TV crews took over a parking lot near the courthouse where dozens of satellite dishes were set up to carry news of the trial across the world.

Following opening statements, Lasch began methodically laying out her case, calling as her first witness Kerry Allison, a Kennedy family friend who was at the estate on Easter weekend.

Allison and another young woman told of a festive luncheon at the estate where drinks were consumed before a late evening outing to a bar. At the bar,

Kennedy Smith trial update

- A friend of the alleged victim took the stand, telling of her night on the town with the woman who later said she was raped by Smith.
- The prosecution said it would call Smith's uncle, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, as a witness.
- The prosecution also accused the defense of trying to orchestrate the senator's testimony.

Christmas trees cut for needy

Man gives to those who might otherwise go without

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

When Howard Fick began cutting his own Christmas tree eight years ago, he also started giving trees to families who may not have them otherwise.

"Instead of just cutting one for us, I would cut a trailer load of 40 or 50 trees and take them down to a school lot," said Fick, a Manhattan attorney.

Left with a sign that said, "Please take one," the cedars always disappeared completely.

But Fick wanted to be sure the people taking the trees were the ones who really needed them. So, about three years ago, he turned to the Flint Hills Breadbasket to help distribute the trees.

Breadbasket Director Atina Hanna said this year about 200 families have signed up to receive a free tree. They will be able to pick them up Dec. 14 at the Breadbasket.

When Fick asked for the Breadbasket's help three years ago, Hanna said, she greeted him with "open arms" because providing free trees fit well with the organization's mission.

"People who need food also need any number of things," Hanna said.

Families who receive one of Fick's cedar trees will be able to conserve their spending power, she said, and have money for other needs.

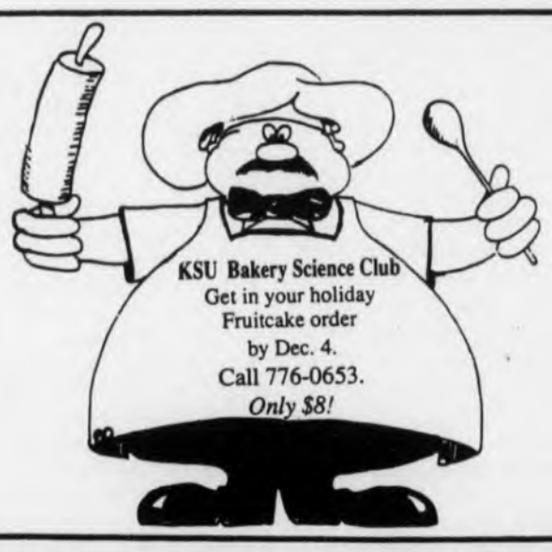
Fick, whom Hanna calls a "seasonal angel," cuts his cedars from area farmers' and ranchers' land with their permission.

The service he provides is twofold. Not only does he put trees in homes that might otherwise go without, he helps landowners control the pesky, abundant cedars that take over their spreads.

"They're glad to have us take a couple hundred trees out of their pasture," Fick said.

Someday, he said, he may begin asking for $1 for every tree he hauls off the land. That money would be donated to the Breadbasket.

On a Saturday in December, Fick will shed his business suit for work clothes as about 10 people bring out their chainsaws and pick-up trucks to help him harvest Christmas trees.



While he figures most people, like him, would probably rather go shopping on a weekend during the holiday season, he said the opposite is true.

"When I ask somebody to get their chainsaw and give up their Saturday in the Christmas season, I hardly ever get a 'no,'" Fick said.

Sometimes he has extra volunteer help. One year a fraternity lent a hand, and this year the Boy Scouts will join him.

David Colvin, executive director of the Pawnee Council of Boy Scouts, said he knew about Fick's holiday good will from Fick's previous work with the scouts. Colvin said he won't

OPINION

EDITORIALS

It won't be easy, but it should be just

It may be the ultimate test of the jury system.

In between juror selection consultants and tabloids, a jury will be asked to establish justice in the case of Florida vs. William Kennedy Smith.

It won't be easy.

To begin with, rape cases are notoriously nasty. Quite often, the morals of the accuser are questioned. While this has happened on the NBC Nightly News and in the New York Times, it won't occur in the Palm Beach courtroom, thanks to a smart prosecutor.

Prosecutor Moira Lasch found three women from Smith's past who alleged the nephew of Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy had assaulted them. Certainly it must have made Smith's top-dollar defense attorneys squirm. To prevent those women from testifying, the defense will not be able question the morals of Smith's accuser.

By the same token, the careful juror selection process ensures that repugnance at the reputation of his famous uncle will not taint Smith's plea to be found innocent.

In that Palm Beach courtroom, Smith and his accuser stand truly equal before the law. A jury, and the judge who ensures the correct application of the law throughout the trial, will study the evidence assembled by both sides, and then determine what happened at the Kennedy compound on March 30.

While much disgust will be heard, perhaps a word or two in praise of the American system of jurisprudence can also be spoken.

Hypocrisy prevails in attorney general

Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan is a firm believer in law and order. He's campaigned tirelessly for the adoption of the death penalty in the state. He's even gone so far as to say that murderers bring their victims to Kansas before killing them.

Whenever county officials are accused of wrongdoing, the attorney general is quick to dispatch one of his deputies to seek their removal from office before those officials have been tried, much less convicted.

Earlier this year when Gov. Joan Finney appointed a special prosecutor to investigate the expanding KPERS scandal, Stephan was quick to complain that the appointment was an unnecessary intrusion in the prerogatives of his office.

Maintaining the integrity of the law is the attorney general's full-time obsession.

And now, so is evading a civil court judgment through a legal loophole.

When a civil court jury found Stephan had violated a promise made to settle out of court a sexual-harassment lawsuit, it ordered him to pay $200,000 in damages.

Instead, Stephan, who makes $66,000 a year as the state's chief law enforcement officer, filed for bankruptcy. Since he's bankrupt, he can't be forced to pay the judgment.

What a neat trick.

What a way for Stephan to prove he's a hypocrite and should be removed from office.

Students can't afford haphazard choices now

In the Dillons store video department the other day, a grandmother with three small children was trying to decide which movies to check out.

Needless to say, this wasn't an easy chore.

The grandchildren, two boys and a girl — none of them over six years of age — had all kinds of ideas as to what might be a good movie. By the look of it, the grandmother had pretty much already made the decision (with the help of the children), but even while she stood in the line, the kids ran back and forth between her and the racks, each time toting another movie they thought they would like to see.

The video department was crowded anyhow, and avoiding those three little bodies while they charged around on the floor space they could traverse was exhausting.

Just watching them run was exhausting as well. It was obvious, after one or two passes, that they hardly knew which movies they had grabbed from the shelf before taking them back to grandma. And she'd no more than shaken her head before they would be back with yet another.

I had almost forgotten which movie I had picked out myself by the time the grandmother, who was in front of me in the line, got up to the counter. My head was full of priorities, and remembering the homework I'd left unfinished in my room, I decided to skip the movie.

The thing is, I never got around to that homework either. When I got back to my room, I found something on television that I'd never wanted to see before, but it looked pretty good in the face of all that work I needed to do.

At this point in the semester, it's inevitable. It turns out that a head full of priorities doesn't amount to much when one is sick of what one knows he or she should do.

It's hard to keep up, and once behind, it's hard to do what's necessary to catch back up. It's much easier to watch a movie or a TV program.

Some consolation can be taken from the fact that the semester is almost over. But swamped, in the middle of it, with finals coming up and papers due, the forthcoming end of the semester doesn't seem to be of much immediate help.

Ultimately, it must be a matter of balance. One must balance his or her schedule. Instead of cramming nonstop, one should work a while, and then rest a while. Spend substantial time at study, but do something else as well. Treat yourself. Take the time for that movie.

This is, of course, what we all know, but what so many of us fail to do.

The truth is that it's late. There really isn't much time left.

The grandkids in the Dillons video department rushed non-stop back and forth with neither purpose nor conviction for the movies they picked up. As students, with two weeks of school left, we can hardly afford to make such haphazard choices.

Balance is the key, obviously. Keep up, but take a break, too. Do what you must, but make what you do matter.

Good luck.

C'est la vie

There's no toilet paper; but there's friends, burgers & beers

JANA LEEP GUEST

This is the second column from Jana Leep, K-State senior in psychology. She is currently studying at the University of Caen in Caen, France.

France — she's treating me with an expected indifference. I practically have to carry an umbrella in a holster for quick-draw purposes — prepared for the predictably erratic rain, prepared for the men who pester us like flies on fruit. This is not meant to be a self-indulgent compliment. "No" just does not exist here, and even worse, if we admit our nationality, we instantly become "terrorists," or "bimbos — homesick and needing someone to sleep with." (These are exact translations.)

So the games go on, and we have masterminded a strategy. Recently, we tested this plan. We professed to a batch of guys, "Nous sommes les femmes qui aiment d'autres femmes."

I know it's not right to claim a different sexual preference for the sake of survival, but it worked — there was a distinctive horror in their eyes. And besides that, we American gals figure that if we have had to tolerate drunken screams of "I hate Americans," then we can regard ourselves as anything we choose.

I swear we are in eighth grade again. Perhaps even "Romper Room." We giggle and make faces at the unbearable eyeballs that bug out not only when English is spoken, but especially when Birkenstocks are worn. And we have not seen one French woman wearing a walkman. I figure I violently disrupt my appearance when I walk to school listening to loud music.

But most queer is when at McDonald's, our American sanctuary, we have to order from the English menu in a pouty French accent — "Sheekan Meec Nuggates." It's too much.

But last week, we gals lost it. Pushed by an ethnocentric impulse, we acquired an obnoxious Mid-Western drawl, and for three hours and numerous beers, we indulged.

I became "Nellie," the self-conscious, loud-mouthed fiancé of "Truck," who happened to be Kathy's persona except with a large beer gut and a fetish for basketball scores. And then there was "Bobcat Jo," a quick-witted Tricia with a slew of down-home expressions that kept me cussing and gnawing at the bit all evening.

I don't know if it was the dialect or the beer, but I had an inconvenient headache the next morning, which not only diminished the pleasure of my short visit to America's Heartland, but also hindered my ability to clean my room with precision and speed.

I woke early in fear of the "Violent Femmes," that is the mards, or in a more polite form, "les femmes de ménage." The "Violent Femmes" provide a quaint French atmosphere quite different from my experience at K-State. Each morning, except Saturday and Sunday, they unlock our doors, enter the rooms, (many of us have been found butt-naked dressing for school), empty our trash, glance around the room and inevitably declare: "Clean this room."

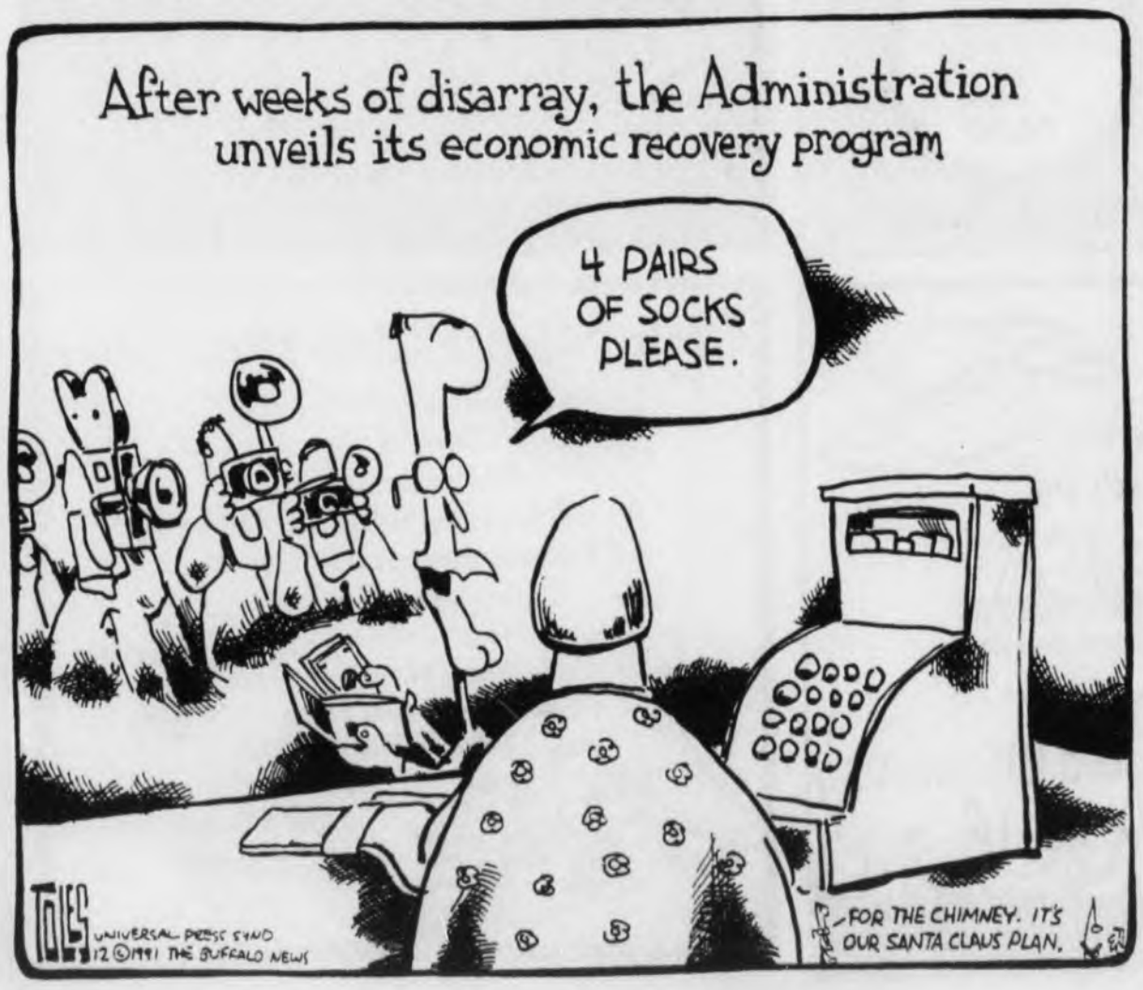
Can you imagine the uproar at Haymaker Hall if a battalion of "Violent Femmes" charged in at 8 a.m. each morning? But what's worse is that most of them do not have teeth.

Either I am a spoiled American or the French are a foresaken bunch. It could be both; it's probably neither. But in my residence hall complex of 800-900 students, many of whom are international students, there exists one washer and one dryer.

Again, can you imagine Ford Hall, hundreds of freshman girls, piles and piles of laundry, having to resort to a shopping spree instead of the line formed in front of a small laundry room? I was there once. I know it would be a bittersweet panic.

I do not suffer like a friend of mine who lives with a French family. I have nothing to complain about, for I have hot water at least 12 hours each day. My friend, though, has been allowed two showers each week. He has to sneak his head under a faucet, always in fear of being asked at breakfast, "Why do you smell clean?"

When he's late to class, I always wonder if he has been sitting in his room waiting for his hair to dry, hiding his secret activities from his family.



And the weirdness continues. I have seen slam dancing to the Bee Gees at a seedy shack called "El Corto." Drawn on the outside of the bar is a brilliant representation of El Corto's ambiance — a man straight from the Village People with an earring, black leather jacket and police cap.

There was no cover charge. I was desperate for atmosphere and I found it. The 1970s were alive and well — cylinder pants, James Brown and pouted collars. I danced alone. They moved as free, smiling, loud, spasmodic people. I finally was at home.

But such moments of familiarity do not always last long. As my Icelandic friend, Arndis, was recounting for us her initial difficulty in pronouncing the English word, "dictionary," we American gals were struck with pangs of homesickness. Thus, with this mood change, we all wanted McDonald's fare, but we knew there was nothing to do but shrug off the hunger and attempt to find familiarity again.

But a recent realization may provide solace for our waves of culture shock. Arndis, in her infinite wisdom, summed up the awkward nature of living in a foreign country, of living the French reality: "France is a country without toilet seats, without toilet paper."

The statement is true for those of us living in the dorms, and now it's our responsibility to move beyond our irritation, beyond even our humor and accept it as a fact.

Money better spent on food than booze

Editor,

After reading the articles on poverty published in the Nov. 20 issue, I made a decision. I will donate food to one of the distribution centers. I hope all who read this issue will also.

Another idea: If you normally go drinking on the weekends, why not skip this weekend and spend the money on food for those who need it? Sure, you won't wake up the next morning with an excruciating headache, and you won't waste your day feeling groggy and weak, but there's always next weekend.

And if you smoke, eat snacks or drink pop, why not skip it for a day or two and use the money to buy a few cans of veggies to donate? Those of us who have so much need to be reminded of those who don't.

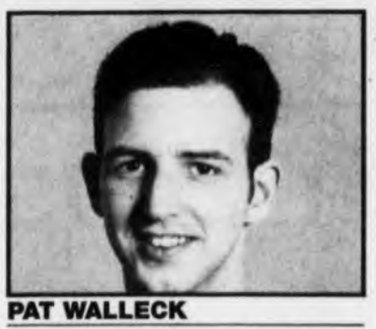
Texas Heat chills in Manhattan

Darrell Nulisch ends 6-year hiatus with 'real-deal' blues and a new band

PAT WALLECK
A&E Writer



Real deal blues is coming back to Manhattan from a six-year hiatus.

Tonight, Darrell Nulisch & Texas Heat will take over the Snookie's stage to perform their tight, intelligent and powerfully hot Texas blues.

Darrell Nulisch has been recording for more than 10 years. He co-founded other national blues acts such as Anson Funderburgh & the Rockets and played his searing harp with Ronnie Earl & the Broadcasters.

The Texas Heat, Nulisch's newest concoction, features other artists with high credentials. Drummer David Olson spent a stint with the Robert Cray Band, and bassist Steve Gomes has played with Darrell in the Ronnie Earl band as well as laying down the bottom with blues legend John Lee Hooker.

Perhaps the real treat of the show, despite the intense vocals and down-your-throat harp playing of Nulisch, will be the exposure of 20-year-old Jon Moller on guitar. Though age may make Moller appear green, the notes and tone coming from this young talent's guitar are pure blue.

PAT WALLECK

Opening the show for Darrell Nulisch and Texas Heat, will be Manhattan's own version of Texas blues, Elmo & the Deadbeats. The Deadbeats' mix of soft, cool, melodic slow blues, along with roadhouse stomping versions of Fabulous Thunderbirds and Stevie Ray Vaughan tunes should provide an excellent compliment to the Black Top Record recording artists.

If the show goes as planned, according to Mitch Ulrich of Vital-Mac productions, this could be first in a line of national blues acts to come to Manhattan.

"I'm not afraid to bring in a Buddy Guy, or an Albert Collins if the turnout is there." Ulrich said. "It will depend on the response of the public."

The concert is at 9:30 tonight at Snookie's in Aggieville. Admission is a meager four bucks. Advance tickets are available at Vital Vinyl until 6 tonight and then at the door. Be there.

Rollerblades in; skateboards out

Inline skates popular with old and young alike

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Inline skates, or rollerblades as they are known, are on their way to replacing skateboards in popularity with children and adults both.

Although their popularity is increasing now, inline skates have actually been around since roller-skating began.

"If you go to the roller-skating museum in Lincoln, Neb., they have the first skate invented on display, and it's an inline skate," Virginia Stilley, co-owner of Skate Plaza in Manhattan said.

Skate Plaza sells rollerblades and rents them for use at Skate Plaza. They also sell the various pads that are recommended to prevent injuries after a fall.

A good quality pair of inline skates cost from $100 to $500 depending on features.

Skate features to look for are rigidity of the boot, number of wheels — the more the better — size of the wheels and quality of the wheel bearings.

Discount stores sell cheaper versions of the skates.

"They are OK for kids, but I wouldn't advise them for adults. They just don't hold up," Stilley said.

Aspartame use raises questions

Experts still disagree on side effects of sweetener 10 years after its FDA approval

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

While diet drinks might save you a few calories, some are concerned about the safety of the artificial sweetener, NutraSweet™.

HEALTH

"Over the past 10 years, diet drinks have gained much of the market share," said David Ptacek, general manager of Bird Music and Vending Company Inc., Manhattan, a supplier of vending machines.

Best-sellers are Diet Coke,™ Diet Dr Pepper,™ and Diet Pepsi,™ Ptacek said.

Most diet soft drinks in vending machines are sweetened with either NutraSweet or a mixture. NutraSweet is the brand name of aspartame, which has quickly become the most popular artificial sweetner. While NutraSweet Co. has a monopoly on the sweetener, the company's patent on it expires in 1992.

Today aspartame is used in more than 100 products, said Karen Penner, associate professor of foods and nutrition and food science extension specialist.

For people who don't want to cut down on sweets, whether they are dieting or not, consuming foods that contain aspartame rather than sugar eases the guilt trip, Penner said.

"There is an inherent basic preference for sweets. The level of sweet we like is probably education, a matter of learning," said Edgar Chambers IV, associate professor of foods and nutrition and director of The Sensory Analysis Center.

Aspartame is up to 200 times sweeter than sucrose. One gram of aspartame contains 4 kilocalories, the same as sugar. But because so little is needed, it is virtually calorie-free.

Aspartame was first approved in 1974 but was banned just one year later. In 1981 the Food and Drug Administration reapproved aspartame for some foods, in beverages and as a table-top sweetener.

Today, despite its popularity and FDA approval, questions about aspartame's effects on a person's mind and body still exist.

Some studies suggest that aspartame changes the brain chemistry. Very high amounts of aspartame, which is composed of two amino acids, in the body can block the flow of the other amino acids that produce the neurotransmitters in the brain. When those neurotransmitters are not available, the person's mood and diet can be affected, and he or she can even have seizures or headaches.

Other experts say it is unlikely one person would ever consume enough aspartame for it to be dangerous.

"If people replaced all sugar and saccharin in the diet by aspartame, the highest concentration reached would be 34 milligrams per kilogram body weight," said Fadi Aramouni, assistant professor of foods and nutrition and food systems extension specialist.

The FDA considers aspartame safe up to an acceptable daily intake of 50 milligrams per kilogram body weight. A woman, for instance, weighing about 110 pounds would have to drink 12 cans of an aspartame-sweetened drink in a day to exceed the ADI.

"Aspartame is in a lot of products, but the FDA doesn't accept it in products where one could exceed the ADI," Chambers said.

Today Americans get most of their aspartame from soft drinks, Aramouni said.

Aspartame consists of two amino acids, phenylalanine and aspartic acid.

Aramouni said people with phenylketonuria, a hereditary disease, who cannot degrade phenylalanine, must avoid aspartame. In high concentrations, phenylalanine can cause brain damage. That's why all aspartame-sweetened products carry a warning.

Experts disagree as to whether aspartame-sweetened products help people lose weight or not.

"While consumption of artificial sweeteners has increased enormously in the United States, there is little indication that Americans are getting slimmer," Steven Farber said in the July 1990 issue of the MIT Technology Review.

The article included results from a study at the Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine, which found that people "immediately and completely compensated for the reduction of calories by eating more."

And the FDA itself, in the FDA Consumer magazine of February 1985, reports there is little documented evidence that the consumption of artificially sweetened foods has contributed to weight loss among Americans.

Penner said, in a context of a balanced diet, aspartame-sweetened foods would not cause problems. One should not, however, live on aspartame-sweetened products only. Such processed foods lack most of the vitamins and minerals and are rather expensive compared to fresh fruits and vegetables.

She said infants' bottles are definitely the wrong place for Kool-aid.™

"Babies need a lot of calories for growth not the calorie reduction," she said. "No one should feed babies with Kool-aid or cola."

Aspartame facts

- Aspartame, manufactured under the brand name NutraSweet, has become the most popular artificial sweetener on the market.
- While one gram of aspartame contains 4 kilocalories, the same as sugar, aspartame is 200 times sweeter than sucrose.
- Since so little is needed in comparison to sugar, aspartame is virtually calorie-free.

For Women Only
Memorial Hospital's new low-dose, film-screen mammography unit is designed and used exclusively for mammograms. Our service is professionally staffed by experienced radiologic technologists and it is fully accredited by the American College of Radiology.
One out of every nine women will develop breast cancer in her lifetime. The best defense and the key to surviving breast cancer is early detection. Mammograms done in conjunction with monthly breast self-examination (BSE) and annual exams by your doctor provide the most protection. What should you do?
- Practice breast self-examination monthly.
- Have a breast exam by your physician annually.
- When you reach the age of 35, ask your physician to schedule you for a baseline mammogram, and follow the American Cancer Society guidelines thereafter. Between the ages of 40 and 49, a mammogram should be done every one to two years, with a physical breast exam every year. After age 50, a mammogram and physical breast exam should be done every year.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTS

It's unanimous: Smith chosen All-Big 8

Barta listed on 1st team defense; 10 Cats receive postseason recognition

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Running backs Derek Brown of Nebraska and Tony Sands of KU joined K-State wide receiver Michael Smith as unanimous selections Tuesday on the 1991 Associated Press All-Big Eight football team.

Oklahoma's Mike Gaddis, who came back from reconstructive knee surgery to finish third in the league in rushing, was named first-team on all but one ballot by a panel of 16 sports writers and sportscasters who regularly cover the Big Eight.

Keithen McCant, who was not even listed on Nebraska's two-deep chart when practice began but topped the league in passing and led the Huskers to a share of the conference title with Colorado, was named quarterback.

Nebraska's big-play sophomore Johnny Mitchell was named tight end for the second year in a row. Jay Leeuwenburg, Colorado's 265-pound senior, was a unanimous choice at center for the second straight year.

Nebraska's dominating pair of Will Shields, 280-pound junior, and Brian Boerboom, 285-pound senior, were both named to the first-team offensive line. Joining those two, who helped Nebraska lead the nation in rushing, were Chris Perez, 280-pound KU senior, and Brian Brauninger, a 279-pound senior from Oklahoma.

Sophomore Dan Eichloff of KU repeated as first-team punter and moved up from second-team to first-team place-kicker.

Anchoring the defense are Colorado noseguard Joel Steed, 6-3, 270, who was also first-team as a junior, and Oklahoma's senior linebacker Joe Bowden, who were both unanimous. The other defensive linemen are junior Dana Stubblefield of KU, 6-4, 285, and senior Stacey Satterwhite of Oklahoma State, 6-6, 270.

Smith

Barta

The defensive ends are Oklahoma junior Reggie Barnes and Oklahoma State sophomore Jason Gildon, who set a Cowboy record with 16 quarterback sacks.

Joining Bowden in the linebacker corps are a pair of juniors, Greg Biekert of Colorado and Brooks Barta of K-State. The defensive backs are seniors Jason Belser of Oklahoma and Tyrone Legette of Nebraska, and Colorado junior Eric Hamilton.

Colorado quarterback Darian Hagan led the Buffs to a third straight unbeaten Big Eight season but was second in passing behind McCant and was hampered by injury in several games and dropped from first to second team. Joining him in the second team backfield are running backs Calvin Jones of Nebraska, Lamont Warren of Colorado and Eric Gallon of K-State.

McCant, Sands and Gaddis are three of the most compelling stories in college football this year. A fifth-year senior, McCant had completed just two of three passes with one interception before this year. He came out of spring practice third on the depth chart.

But he took over the starting job during the first game and went on to pass for 1,454 yards and 13 touchdowns. He also rushed for 654 yards — a 5.6-yard average, and scored seven TDs.

At 5-foot-6, Sands was barely recruited out of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and came to KU when first-year coach Glen Mason pointed out he would have an immediate chance to start for the rebuilding Jayhawks. He led KU in rushing for four straight years, set school records in touchdowns and rushing and, against Missouri in his last collegiate game, carried an NCAA-record 58 times for an NCAA-record 396 yards.

Gaddis, in contrast, seemed on his way to Heisman-type stardom in 1989 when he hurt his knee in Oklahoma's game against Texas. The injury was so severe he sat out all last year and did not play much this year until Dewell Brewer got hurt in the fourth game. But given a chance, he went on to flash his old form.

The Big Eight rushing charts after the final game listed Sands with 1,442 yards, Brown with 1,313 and Gaddis with 1,240. Brown and Gaddis scored 14 touchdowns apiece and Sands had nine.

"I always felt that I would be able to come back and play," Gaddis said. "The reason I sat out last season was so that I could come back and play at the level I wanted to play again."

Brown, a junior, is the only running back to go over 100 yards this year against No. 2 Washington.

"He has good vision and good speed. He accelerates through the hole with a lot of velocity," Oklahoma coach Gary Gibbs said. "He has the ability to make the backside cut and to make people miss."

The 5-9, 160-pound Smith has been at the heart of K-State's amazing resurgence under third-year coach Bill Snyder. While the Wildcats were winning seven games this year, their most since 1954, he became No. 2 all-time in career receptions in the Big Eight and No. 3 in career receiving yard with 2,457. He also has eight school records. He led all Big Eight receivers this season with 55 catches for 768 yards and six touchdowns.

Cats, KU, Ahearn: Great trio

As we embark on the 100th anniversary of basketball this season, this sports fan dreams of one more basketball game in Ahearn Field House between K-State and KU.

After all, it could be considered a tribute to the inventor of the game, Dr. James Naismith. Even though the game was invented in Pennsylvania, the state of Kansas has inherited much of the history of the sport.

What better way to pay tribute to Naismith than by having a game between two of the winningest teams in the country played on a court that has meant so much to K-State fans for the better part of four decades?

Ahearn Field House shares much of the history of the sport of basketball. More than four million people witnessed Ahearn's winning ways. The Wildcats recorded a 378-87 record from 1950 to 1988. The largest crowd to ever witness a K-State home game was in 1951 when 14,028 fans showed up at Ahearn to watch the Cats defeat Long Island, 85-65.

The idea of a nostalgia game is not to walk in the footsteps of the Chicago White Sox or the Baltimore Orioles, but to pay tribute to the sport of basketball. No popcorn for a nickel or soda pop for a dime like it was in the "good ol' days."

And let's not bring back any of the old uniforms. I'm glad to see the short shorts go out of style and I have no desire to see K-State wear lavender again. But one final game in Ahearn would be a treat for basketball fans to see.

Bramlage Coliseum is a great facility and undoubtedly will bring a lot of basketball history to K-State fans in the next 100 years. But anyone who witnessed last Monday's game against Missouri-Rolla had to be a little disappointed.

It was the smallest Bramlage Coliseum crowd to ever watch a basketball game. Even when small crowds showed up at Ahearn they seemed to be a lot louder then their numbers would indicate. Indiana head coach Bobby Knight gave the field house one of the biggest compliments ever when he was quoted in an Indiana newspaper as

Miller's thriller lifts Lady Cats

Shot in lane gives K-State 66-64 victory

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

Whew!

It wasn't easy, but the Lady Cats captured their first win of the season, a 66-64 Bramlage Coliseum heart-stopper over Oral Roberts.

With 23 seconds remaining and the game tied at 62-62, point-guard Mary Jo Miller hit a shot in the lane that proved to be the game winner.

K-State held on defense as Jara McCoy missed a 3-pointer and Gretchen Bertrand wrestled a jumpball from the Titans' Helen Garrett with 3.7 seconds.

Oral Roberts retained possession on the held ball, however, and with 1.8 seconds left, Artan Henry took a 21-foot jump shot that hit the back of the rim.

"I was just praying she'd miss it," said Kelly Moylan, who scored a career-high 17 points.

Although the Lady Cats may have sent out an SOS to the heavens, it was the way they went to the boards after the shot that may have saved the game.

"I was thinking rebound first," Honeycutt said. "I didn't want them to get the rebound and put it back up."

The position that K-State was able to fight for down low was vital as the ball came down to Garrett in a crowd of Lady Cats under the basket. The heavy traffic in the paint kept Garrett from getting a handle on the ball as the final second ticked off the clock.

K-State is now 1-2 on the season. Oral Roberts fell to 1-4.

The win was a step up for the Lady Cats, who lost the season opener at Illinois-Chicago, 68-64 in overtime, and fell to Creighton 77-57 in their home opener Saturday.

"I'm glad for our players," Coach Susan Yow said. "At this point, a win is a win. This was a big win for us.

"Without having a win, we could have folded, but we didn't and that shows character on the part of our team."

That character was truly challenged, to say the least, as McCoy hit a 3-pointer with 1:23 left that put the Titans up 64-62. That was the final points of a 15-3 run by Oral Roberts that erased what was a 10-point Lady Cat lead with just over five minutes left to play.

Fortunately, McCoy's trey was not

Spikers take small steps

Hagemeyer says success measured in different ways

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

"Whoever wants to reach a distant goal must take many small steps."
—Helmut Schmidt, former German chancellor

That quote would best describe the situation that Patti Hagemeyer faced as K-State volleyball team coach this season.

Outside observers might come to the conclusion that the Wildcats took more steps backward than forward after a 10-19 overall record, a 1-11 Big Eight mark, and a tie for the final spot in the conference standings. But for Hagemeyer, there is no doubt that the team started its move in the right direction.

"All the steps the team made were forward, there's no question," Hagemeyer said. "I think every step this program took was because of the hard work of the players who were involved and by the coaching staff. They all contributed to the program with a number of accomplishments."

Hagemeyer said in order to have a good program, things have to be broken down to simply being a competitive team. And that's what was done this year.

"Our success was never rated on a win-loss record," she said. "I wasn't concerned about losses and wins at home or on the road because these things weren't important to us now."

With that philosophy in mind, Hagemeyer wasn't disappointed the team missed the postseason Big Eight Tournament.

"I never said that our goal was going to the tournament," she said. "You have always got to think about going to it, but we didn't judge ourselves on that. So, I'm not frustrated nor disappointed because there were many, many things that this team could do today that they couldn't do three months ago."

The Cats started the season with two victories over Chicago State and

Mets' uniform fits Bonilla fine

NEW YORK (AP) — On Nov. 18, a day after meeting with Bobby Bonilla, New York general manager Al Harazin sent the outfielder a Mets jersey with the free agent's name stitched across the back.

It took two weeks and $29 million before Bonilla agreed to wear the uniform. But finally, after a frenzied six-team negotiation, the Mets won the biggest bidding war in the history of U.S. team sports.

Bonilla, a 28-year-old outfielder who left the Pittsburgh Pirates to become a free agent, agreed late Monday to a five-year contract that made him the highest paid player in team sports.

"New York City was in my heart," Bonilla said from his home in Bradenton, Fla. "It'll be hard to knock the smile off my face."

The $5.8 million annual average value tops the team sports record of $5.5 million (six years, $33 million) set when Patrick Ewing recently signed a new deal with the New York Knicks.

The previous baseball record was $5,380,250, held by Boston Red Sox pitcher Roger Clemens, whose four-year contract extension begins next season. The total amount of Bonilla's deal breaks the previous baseball record set by outfielder Jose Canseco in his five-year, $23.5 million contract with the Oakland Athletics.

Finney criticized by prosecutor

Convicted killer's good prison record reason for governor's reduction of life term

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Geary County prosecutor criticized a decision by Kansas Gov. Joan Finney to shorten the life sentence of a woman convicted of killing her husband in 1983.

Brenda Lemon, who was found guilty of first-degree murder in the death of Fort Riley soldier Joseph Lemon, became eligible for parole when Finney reduced her sentence last week to 10 to 20 years in prison. Lemon still must appear before the Kansas Parole Board and gain its approval before she could be released.

Martha Walker, a spokeswoman for the governor, said Finney reduced Lemon's sentence because of her good prison and work records, and the fact that she has a child.

It was the second sentence the governor has shortened since taking office in January. She has received 70 such requests.

The other reduction came in November for Gerald Rice of Wichita, who was serving a 9 to 12-year prison term for the sale of marijuana. Rice's sentence was reduced to 4 to 8 years, which means he must serve two years before becoming eligible for parole.

Geary County Attorney Chris Biggs said Monday he was upset with the way state officials handled Lemon's case.

Kansas law says a governor can reduce any sentence after the judges and prosecutors involved are informed. Biggs said he was not told about Lemon's commutation until after it was finalized last Wednesday.

Had Geary County prosecutors known that Finney was considering reducing Lemon's sentence, "we would have lodged our objections, obviously," Biggs said.

Walker said all the proper steps were followed before Finney signed the commutations.

Chuck Simmons, chief legal counsel for the Kansas Department of Corrections, said notices were sent to the Geary County attorney's office and to trial judge Melvin Gradert.

"It's fine and well to say, 'We sent out a letter,'" Biggs said. "But I think this kind of thing is important enough" to use certified mail.

He said he hoped the notification requirements would be tightened by the 1992 Legislature.

Students witness jailbreak

Visit to Lansing and Leavenworth full of surprises for Corrections class

MELLISSA PETERS
Collegian Reporter

Twelve K-State students witnessed a prisoner escape from the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing Tuesday.

Karen Baird-Olson, an instructor in anthropology and social work who has taught the Corrections class for the past three years, includes a visit to the state penitentiary and the U.S. Penitentiary at Leavenworth in the class requirements.

"It's a chance for them to actually be inside the walls and experience this special work environment," Olson said.

Since only 15 students are allowed to visit at a time, the class takes four trips per semester. Federal prison officials began limiting the number of people in each group a couple of years ago when an inmate walked out with the group, Olson said.

The group was in for a surprise Tuesday when they reached Lansing.

At about 11 a.m., an hour after being checked in and given visitor badges at the door, the group was getting ready to enter the maximum security block. The guide was then informed that an emergency count was being conducted in the maximum security block, and all visitors would have to leave.

The group was guided out of the maximum security block, and the tour was directed to the education facilities and the medium security block. But then the guide was informed that the medium security block was also being locked down for an emergency count.

Fifteen minutes later, it was announced that a prisoner had escaped, and the students were asked to leave.

The day was not completely lost, though, because a visit to the federal penitentiary was also on the agenda.

Checking in at the federal penitentiary was different from the state prison. When entering the parking lot, the car is stopped at a booth with a speaker in it. A voice comes on and asks if there are any firearms, explosives, cameras, drugs or alcohol in the car.

Clearance here meant students had to sign and print their names, get badges, have their pictures taken, pass through metal detectors and have their badge and pictures checked at each door and passage point.

The first stop was in the A-cell block, which has six floors of cells the entire length of the building. Both double and single cells are about 10 feet by 10 feet with a dresser, toilet, sink and chair, the only difference being some have one bed, others have two.

As the group walked through the corridor, the prisoners would peek out of their cell door slats and watch their every move.

After visiting the A-cell block, the students were led to the special housing unit where prisoners identified as "discipline problems" were kept, and security is even tighter than the rest of the building. It has its own control booth and holding cell, and prisoners are handcuffed every time they leave their cell.

As the students left the unit, inmates smiled and waved, straining to look out of the slits in the wall.

The rest of the visit was spent in the factory where inmates make furniture, laundry bags and other items used in various areas of the government.

The inmates are paid for the work they do, the guide said. They receive beween 40 cents and $1.15 per hour.

The money earned can go toward court fees, restitution to be paid or financial aid for an inmate's family. It can also be used for personal items, though their purchases are carefully monitored.

Students said they were surprised by the conditions.

"I can't believe we were so close to the inmates," said Mary Clark, junior in arts and sciences undecided. "They could reach out and touch us if they wanted to.

"It's definitely not like the movies," she said. "They have no privacy. I felt like we were observing animals in a zoo."

Baird-Olson said one of the class's objectives is simple — to learn the purpose of prisons. Another objective is for the students to quit thinking in terms of "we" and "they" and more in terms of "us." And she said she wanted them to understand that all offenders and offenses are not alike.

"Most of my students are going to become lawyers or judges, and I want them to know what they are doing when they send somebody to prison," she said. "I want them to know that there are always special cases, and these cases need discretion with some limits.

"So many times discretion is used in favor of those who 'have' against those who 'have not'," Olson said.

Olson said the only problem is, though, that one trip isn't enough.

Kennedy

Smith, his cousin Patrick Kennedy, the two witnesses and some friends danced and drank until about 2 a.m., the witnesses said.

They said members of the group then moved on to the bar where Smith met the alleged victim.

A police crime scene expert presented photos she took of the woman's bruised ankle, foot and hand.

The lawyers spoke after Circuit Judge Mary Lupo rejected the prosecution's bid to present evidence from three women who said they had been sexually attacked by Smith in the 1980s.

"The court denies the state's motion," the judge said, giving no explanation why she rejected a bid to prove that Smith had a history of attacking pretty, unescorted brunettes after charming his way into their confidence.

The 30-year-old Florida woman who alleges Smith raped her is a brunette and met him at a popular Palm Beach discotheque. He invited her back to the estate where she says she was raped on Easter weekend 1991.

Smith, 31, is charged with sexual battery and battery and could receive a maximum of 4 1/2 years in prison if convicted.

Smith came to court surrounded by family. His mother, Jean Kennedy Smith, sat in a front row with another son and daughter and frequently leaned forward to confer with her son across the courtroom bar. Later, she was excluded from court at the prosecutor's request because she may be a witness later.

The judge's ruling about the three women came after final jury selection. Attorneys also chose three alternate jurors but one quickly was called into service when a selected juror bowed out because he knew some witnesses in the case.

Assistant State Attorney Ellen Roberts argued that jurors should hear from the three women. "This was the defendant's plan — to meet unescorted women, take them back to his place and then attack with no sexual innuendo before," said Roberts.

But Black said the claims of the women were not similar enough to show any pattern. And he cited inconsistencies in their accounts.

be helping cut tree personally, but he thinks about six boys will turn out to contribute to this "worthwhile cause."

"For people who can't afford food, a tree is probably their last priority anyway," Colvin said.

Fick doesn't consider himself a philanthropist — though he also volunteers time with Tractors for our Daily Bread and has helped raise funds for the American Heart Association and leukemia research.

He says he's just someone who helps out when he can.

"There are certain things I can do that I enjoy doing that are worthwhile," Fick said.

"Everybody's a kid at heart and remembers those Christmas trees. I would like it better if there were a Christmas tree in every home where there's a kid."

around him and the crowd cheered wildly. A banner hung outside the hospital said "Dear Santa, Please Bring us One More," referring to Anderson.

Steen was to join American Joseph Cicippio, who was freed Monday. A U.S. physician said Cicippio was knocked unconscious when he was abducted in 1986. He suffered frostbite in captivity, the doctor said, but is generally healthy.

Steen said in Damascus that he exercised for two hours every day while in captivity but had had lots of colds. His face and neck were covered with what appeared to be abrasions, which he kept scratching, and Steen said he caused them himself when he shaved for the first time in three years.

Asked if he had a message for his wife, Steen said: "I love her. I miss her."

Virginia Steen later spoke to her husband by telephone from her home in Clark Lake, Mich. "I told him I loved him. I told him he's a grandfather — he didn't know that," she said.

The United States welcomed the release, but White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the ordeal would not be over until all Westerners were freed.

Steen is the eighth Western hostage released since August, when the United Nations began intensive negotiations to arrange a swap of Western hostages for about 300 Arab prisoners held by Israel and its proxy militia in Lebanon. Israel seeks an accounting of four missing servicemen in Lebanon.

Iran, long the chief backer of Lebanese kidnappers, and Syria, the main power broker in Lebanon, now are both striving to free Western hostages.

Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani is seeking to end Iran's isolation and shed its image as an outlaw state that supports terrorism. The Syrians, once the vanguard of Arab radicalism and a longtime Soviet ally, are realigning with the West after the collapse of communism.

Cicippio and Steen were freed after Washington paid Iran $278 million for weaponry impounded during the 1979-80 Tehran hostage crisis.

The weapons and other Iranian assets worth billions of dollars were frozen by the United States in 1979. Tehran has in the past linked hostage releases to the return of those assets.

On Sunday, Israel released 25 Arab prisoners, bringing to 91 the total number set free since August and giving new impetus to hostage releases.

Besides Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, two Germans — Thomas Kemptner and Heinrich Struebig — are still held. An Italian is missing, but reports say he is dead. Anderson, kidnapped on March 16, 1985, is the longest held.

There are growing indications that Perez de Cuellar and his hostage envoy, Giandomenico Picco, have worked out a deal with the kidnappers that includes the release of the remaining Western hostages.

It's not clear what the kidnappers are getting in return. But it may involve some kind of compromise regarding the Germans.

The sport is gaining popularity with many people.

"It's mostly people in their early to mid-20s," Mike Powell, Ballard's Sporting Goods salesman said. "But it's not unusual to see people in their 30s come in and buy a pair."

Protective gear is recommended when using inline skates.

"You can go out not wearing any protection and skin up every possible part of your body," Powell said. "If I were doing it, I would put everything on."

The recommended equipment consists of a helmet, knee and elbow pads, and gloves with a special brace to prevent wrist injuries.

The technique used for inline skates is more closely related to ice skating than to conventional skating because of the design of the skates.

"Most people can learn to be pretty confident on them in a couple weeks," Powell said. "The hardest part about it is deciding how you are going to stop."

For serious skaters, the United States Amateur Confederation of Rollerskating in Lincoln, Neb., has started a competition for inline skating. Manhattan currently doesn't have any clubs or competitions.

Stilley said inline skates currently account for about 10 percent of their rentals.

"Skateboarding is just too dangerous," Stilley said. "The inline skates won't hurt property like a skateboard will. Kids will ride up walls on skateboards and damage them, or hit a bench or a wall and chip it."

K-State doesn't have any current regulations against inline skating.

"It's one of those issues that hasn't really been addressed yet," Lt. Robert Mellgren of the K-State Police said. "At this point in time, it's legal on campus. We haven't really seen any damage caused by it yet. I have only seen two or three people who do much of it on campus."

The City of Manhattan takes a different view. Manhattan has a city ordinance making it illegal to ride a coaster, skateboard, roller skates or similar device on any public sidewalk, any parking lot owned by a governmental unit within any publicly owned park or upon any roadway within the city limits.

"Skateboarding was the impetus for this law," Lt. John Doehling of the Riley County Police Department said. 'Skateboarding groups that had sprung up had been doing considerable damage to public property."

The ordinance has been in effect for one and a half years.

'Just Guys' able to talk openly

Group discusses life, women and feelings; not football

SHAWN BRUCE
A&E Writer

Editors note: Because of the sensitive nature of the issues discussed, some of the following names have been changed.

In a small room at the K-State Union, 11 men gathered to talk about life, women and how one man's current girlfriend whispers to his penis and refuses to tell him what she says to it.

> "Normally, guys don't talk about feelings with other guys. This meeting provides an opportunity to be open and speak truthfully."
> Chris

The men's movement has come to K-State in the form of a group called "Just Guys." To listen to the participants speak, it's long overdue.

"Normally, guys don't talk about feelings with other guys," Chris said. "This meeting provides an opportunity to be open and speak truthfully."

Steve agrees.

"I went on a camping trip this summer with three other guys," he said. "Only after going out and shooting things with B.B. guns all day were we finally able to break down and talk around the campfire about something besides football."

Not everyone is happy about this newfound openness in guy communication, group founder Taylor Mali said. Some people have been hesitant about letting him post fliers on campus announcing the meetings. One woman had an even more unusual request.

"She asked me to secretly tape one of the meetings so she could listen to it," Mali said.

Not to worry. There are no secret plans being discussed to force people to worship large phallic symbols. In fact, most "Just Guys" meetings revolve around the age-old topics of women and whether or not it's possible to communicate with them.

"You can talk about everything with women, but you have to have a certain amount of respect," Bill said, one of two married participants. "Guys just won't edit themselves in conversation or body language."

While agreeing with Bill, Larry, the other married participant, took the idea farther.

"The situation in the world is changing, and men feel threatened. In a situation like this, one group is always put on the defensive and grows afraid of making a mistake," he said. "We should be able to talk, but we get mad and all bent out of shape."

Other guys aren't so sure that the problem is entirely theirs.

"I understand that in the past, women and minorities have been oppressed," John said. "I just hate to be blamed for it."

"I understand the need to break down old stereotypes," David said. "But I don't think it's as important to break down some of the old traditions as it is to breakdown the old conceptions."

Although not all in agreement, the mere fact men are talking about issues such as these is a victory according to "Just Guys" participants. Despite labels like "Just Gays" and being stereotyped by both men and women, they plan on continuing as long as there's an interest.

"I just want to be able to talk to a guy about anything and have him say, 'That's OK,'" Mali said.

increased their record to 4-1. Then, after a partial success of winning one set at that time against No. 1 UCLA, the spikers went through several up and downs.

One of the deep valleys for the team was the departure of five players from the squad during the season. But Hagemeyer said the remaining players made a strong commitment to the program.

"During the second half of the Big Eight season the team established a medium range of performance," Hagemeyer said. "Of course, there were matches where I thought we stubbed our toe, but it's not that the players went on without having learned something from that.

"I think the team worked very hard and I think their intensity has improved. They were emotionally involved in the matches and the physical performance has individually improved."

Hagemeyer said the team got positive recognition from outsiders.

Kathy Saxton was named as an All-Big Eight honorable mention selection and was the Big Eight player of the week after 30 kills in a match against Drake.

Saxton was also nominated to the All-Big Eight academic team along with teammates Alison Mott, Rhonda Hughes and Angie McKee.

"I think these things are exciting for the team," Hagemeyer said. "It shows that my team is good enough to receive those accomplishments on and off the court."

Hagemeyer said the season was also a personal success for her.

"I enjoyed my first year as the head coach at K-State," she said. "I wouldn't change any of the work I did because I know my instincts of going the path which is best for the program were right.

"We worked hard, and there is a good future for K-State volleyball. We are really excited about it. And we'll start up again in February."

only the final points of ORU's surge. They were also the final Titan points of the game.

Leah Honeycutt dropped in a layup with 1:04 remaining to tie the game.

Garrett had a golden opportunity to put the Titans in the driver's seat with less than a minute remaining. Garrett stepped to the line for two free throws and proceeded to draw iron on both attempts, leaving the door open for Miller's heroics.

K-State called a timeout with 35 seconds to play to talk strategy.

"We drew up a play for M.J. to hit the shot, hit Leah on the roll or hit Kelly for the three," Yow said. "We had never run that in practice, and it turned out we set the pick too early. But M.J. ended up scoring, and I think that she knew that and was set in her mind that we were looking for her to score."

"The play kind of got busted up," Miller admitted. "But the play that was set up, I was to look to drive, but someone forgot to leave and Leah screened too soon. So it just kind of got all jumbled, and I was trying to create something."

The three players that K-State looked to down the strech — Miller, Honeycutt and Moylan — combined for 49 of the team's 66 points.

It was a career high for Moylan (17) and season high for Miller (18), while Honeycutt tied her career best of 14 points and added 10 boards.

Luckily, those efforts weren't in vain.

After a pause, Miller said, "If we'd have ran the play, it probably wouldn't have worked."

The statement drew laughter from Honeycutt and Moylan — a sound that hasn't been heard much from the Lady Cats recently.

"That's the way the year's been going," Miller said.

saying, "This has to be the greatest basketball crowd in America."

Another thing that has always bothered me about Bramlage Coliseum is that it is not located closer to the main campus. Prices of basketball tickets are high enough without having to pay three dollars to park your car at Bramlage Coliseum. There was always some sort of convenience factor having Ahearn located on the main campus. Plus, it seemed to add more to the history of the school.

Maybe another basketball game in Ahearn is an impossibility. The seating capacity is not as large as it is in Bramlage Coliseum, not to mention the fact that we would have to bring in a scoreboard and some basketball goals. But those people who have seen games in each complex would have to wonder if the move from Ahearn to Bramlage Coliseum was money well spent.

Last American hostage freed

Journalist Terry Anderson released by Islamic captors after 6 1/2 year ordeal

By the Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria — Journalist Terry Anderson, the last American hostage in Lebanon, was freed Wednesday by pro-Iranian Islamic radicals. He said faith and stubbornness helped him survive his nearly seven-year ordeal.

His release ended a brutal saga in which Shiite Muslims kept 13 Americans in chains, killed three and bedeviled two U.S. presidencies.

A joyous Anderson grinned broadly, raised his arms and warmly greeted friends as he entered a conference room at the Syrian Foreign Ministry. He later left to meet his 6-year-old daughter, Sulome, for the first time.

Anderson said sheer determination got him through.

"You just do what you have to do. You wake up every day, summon up the energy from somewhere ... and you get through the day, day after day after day," said Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent of The Associated Press.

"I was lucky enough to have other people with me most of the time," he said.

Shortly after Anderson arrived in Damascus, he spoke by phone with Louis D. Boccardi, the AP's president and chief executive officer. Boccardi said Anderson expressed thanks for the efforts made on his behalf and commented: "I haven't touched the ground yet."

His appearance was delayed for hours. U.N. officials, who have skillfully negotiated for the release of nine hostages since August, said they believed he had been delayed by a snowstorm in Lebanon.

Anderson's kidnappers turned him over to Syrian security officials who delivered him to U.S. Ambassador Christopher Ross in Damascus.

Anderson, wearing a white shirt and a dark cardigan he received only Tuesday from his captors, joked about tight-fitting shoes. He said they were his first new pair since he was kidnapped.

"You can't imagine how glad I am to see you," an emotional Anderson told reporters. "I've thought about this moment for a long time, and now it's here, and I'm scared to death. I don't know what to say." He hugged and kissed Alex Efty, an AP correspondent.

Ending the news conference, he explained: "I have a date with a couple of beautiful ladies, and I'm already very late." He was referring to Sulome and her mother, Madeleine.

HOSTAGES IN THE MIDDLE EAST

- The last American hostage in Lebanon, Terry Anderson, was released yesterday by his captors.
- U.N Secretary- General Perez de Cuellar is still working to free two German hostages.

Perez de Cuellar praises success; prepares for more work

By the Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — A joyful Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar hailed Terry Anderson's release from captivity Wednesday but said there was still work to be done.

"I am very pleased," said the U.N. chief, who negotiated intensively for the release of Anderson and other hostages. "The American chapter has been closed, but I have other chapters still to close."

He said he would press on with his efforts to free the two remaining German hostages, the 300 Arab detainees in south Lebanon and to get information to Israel and Iran on its missing nationals.

"It is not the end of my efforts, because I intend to continue working to the Dec. 31 to obtain the other hostages' freedom," he said.

Although he is retiring Dec. 31, Perez de Cuellar said he would continue to mediate the release of detainees and to get information "on my own with no mandate from the United Nations."

"What I have done is not a political exercise, it is a humanitarian exercise. I wouldn't work as a representative of anybody," he said after attending a private meeting of the Security Council.

The Security Council president, Soviet Ambassador Yuli Vorontsov, said of Anderson's release: "That's wonderful."

U.S. Ambassador Thomas Pickering emerged from the meeting to echo the same sentiments: "We're delighted to hear that. I understand there are still some (hostages) left, and we would like to see every hostage released everywhere."

Perez de Cuellar added he has received some assurances about the eventual return of the body of Lt. Col. William Higgins, an American U.N. military observer killed by kidnappers in Lebanon in July 1989, allegedly as retaliation for Israel's kidnapping of Sheik Abdul Karim Obeid, a leader of the Shiite group Hezbollah.

Perez de Cuellar said his hostage mediator, Giandomenico Picco, is returning from Damascus and will be back in New York later this week.

Students improve city zoo nursery

K-State contractors provide new viewing for Sunset visitors

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

The nursery at Sunset Zoo will soon be seen by everyone thanks to K-State's Association of General Contractors.

AGC is an organization for students with an interest in the business of construction science. Even though it's not mandatory for membership, all 125 members are construction science majors.

The nursery has been constructed so the public can see baby animals. Zoo director Don Wixom said previously received baby animals were raised in the office, where zoo visitors could not see them.

"We felt we needed to have people see it," Wixom said.

"We put to use a grant we had from the Institute of Museum Services, plus funds from Friends of Sunset Zoo, the city capital improvement budget and the estate of Margaret Deckert, who the nursery is named after," he said.

Wixom said once the nursery was built, there was a problem with seeing into it. Only a window of four square feet existed for visitors to look through. The window caught too much sunlight, which caused a great deal of glare. Also, only a sidewalk was there for visitors to stand on, limiting the area that accommodates nursery spectators.

The zoo staff arranged to have AGC work on eliminating these problems as a project.

Jeff Mertz, junior in construction science and AGC member, said AGC's end of the project entailed scheduling, getting estimates, ordering materials, and the actual construction of the shade and groundwork.

Mertz said he does not consider AGC to be a competitor for the professional contractors in the area, though AGC operates without charging hours for working. Mertz said he estimates this project would cost the zoo about $1,000, because AGC only charges for the cost of materials. The same project, he said, could cost as much as $2,500 for professional contractors to complete.

Original plans were to have the construction completed by Nov. 20, but adverse weather conditions and the arrival of a new animal delayed it.

Even though the nursery's intended purpose is to raise baby animals, it is now holding Nicholas, an adult male red panda.

After Nicholas' arrival to the zoo, he could not immediately be placed in the same cage with Christmas, the zoo's female red panda, due to health reasons. Nicholas has been placed in the nursery under quarantine to check him for parasites and other diseases.

Unfortunately, due to the fact that Nicholas cannot be disturbed while under quarantine, the construction had to come to a halt. Wixom and Mertz have determined that progress on the project should come soon.

Mertz said the project requires about 20 more hours of work. He said he is anxious to see the completion.

"When I finish a project, not only do I feel good because I did a good job, but I feel I did some good for the community," he said.

"When you give $5 to a charity, you don't really see how it helps other people. That's what's great about construction science — we do a lot of community service projects, and we get to see how they help."

No Rhodes for K-State; first time in 16 years

IU student from Manhattan chosen to represent Kansas

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

K-State will not have a Rhodes Scholar this year.

K-State faculty-approved applicant Martha Kropf, non-degree student in political science, interviewed in Topeka Tuesday and Wednesday but was not chosen to compete in district competition. The other nominee for state level competition, Christopher Baldwin, senior in chemical engineering, withdrew from the state competition due to involvement in the Marshall scholarship race, said Nancy Twiss, special assistant to the provost for scholarship development and pre-law adviser.

After ranking in the top one percent of all public and private universities for 16 years for winning the scholarship, K-State placed a scholar in 1986, 1987, 1990, and two scholars in 1989, President Jon Wefald said.

As one of the nation's most prestigious scholarships, recipients receive $30,000 for two years of graduate study at Oxford University in England.

Manhattan resident June Lyle also interviewed in Topeka, and the journalism and English student at Indiana University advanced to district finals in Minnesota this Friday to participate in the last phase of the competition.

There, two scholars will be chosen, Twiss said.

District finalists were chosen by a committee of past Rhodes scholars and prominent Kansans and faced questions in a 20-minute interview about their fields of interest and personal questions pertaining to values and morals, Lyle said.

"They asked me about Norplant (a birth control device) and if I approved of it being used as a deterrent for unemployed women or to prevent cocaine babies," Lyle said, who answered that reproductive rights were separate from a person's economic status.

Pan Am forced to cease flying after years of losses

Delta backs out of previous deal to provide $25 million

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Pan American World Airways, the pioneer that ushered in the era of commercial aviation, ceased operations Wednesday after losing its battle to erase years of losses.

"Today, we see the end of an airline whose name will be forever forged in American history," president and chief executive Russell L. Ray Jr. said.

As Ray issued his statement, Pan Am's planes were grounded, with the exception of those already in the air.

Pan Am became the third U.S. airline to die this year, after Eastern and Midway, amid deep industrywide troubles brought on by the Gulf War and the recession.

The death blow had come a day earlier in U.S. Bankruptcy Court. Delta Air Lines cut off funding to keep Pan Am in the air because it did not believe Pan Am's business plan would work at a time when losses were about $2 million a day and bookings were plunging.

Attempts to keep the airline alive with emergency funding from Trans World Airlines chairman Carl Icahn failed.

Delta had previously agreed to invest millions in a new Pan Am that would have moved from New York to Miami and focused on serving Latin America, with 45 percent to be owned by Delta and 55 percent by Pan Am's creditors.

"It makes no sense to keep putting money down a black hole," Delta spokesman William Berry said.

Passengers holding Pan Am tickets were told to check with other airlines,

Airline bankruptcy

- Pan American World Airways struggled to keep flying today when a bankruptcy reorganization plan was disupted by Delta Airlines' refusal on Tuesday to provide another $25 million.
- Delta, who has already bought parts of Pan Am and provided $115 in financing, refused to pay the additional $25 million because it didn't believe the plan was workable.

CORRECTION

Due to an copy editor's error, there were several inaccuracies in Tuesday's story about the Corrections class visiting State Penitentiary at Lansing and the U.S. Penitentiary at Leavenworth. Karren Baird-Olson, who was incorrectly referred to as Olson rather than Baird-Olson, is an instructor of sociology. Also, the story implies that a Lansing inmate once escaped by walking out with a K-State group. The group the inmate walked out with several years ago was not from K-State.

West Hall retains 24-hour visitation

West Hall residents voted Wednesday night to retain the current 24-hour visitation policy, which went into effect earlier this semester.

Three-fourths of the women who voted were in favor of the 24-hour visitation policy, said Steffany Klaus, vice president of West Hall and senior in family life and human development and community service.

Only about 30 percent of the residents participated in the vote.

Todd Rasmussen, director of West Hall, said the vote merely required a simple majority in order to pass, and the current 24-hour policy would remain in effect until the end of May.

"There will not be another vote until next year when the new residents move in," he said.

Klaus, who had earlier opposed the 24-hour visitation policy, said this time she voted "yes" to keep the current policy.

"I was afraid that problems would occur," she said, " but after the trial run, I found I liked it better," she said.

KU Judicial Board OK's Fulcher's ouster

LAWRENCE, Kan. (AP) — The University of Kansas Judicial Board decided Wednesday that the Student Senate acted properly when it ousted a student body president who was arrested for battering his former girlfriend.

The senate voted Sept. 12 to unseat Darren Fulcher of Kansas City, Mo., but Fulcher appealed the decision.

Fulcher had resisted pressure to resign since August, when reports surfaced that he was arrested for misdemeanor battery for grabbing a former girlfriend in the throat and hitting her in the face.

The Judicial Board — two faculty members, two students and an administrative assistant — conceded that "procedures followed in this case were not fully consistent with due process."

But the board said the "procedural defects did not deprive President Fulcher of an adequate opportunity to present his case ..."

KU Chancellor Gene Budig said the administration would abide by the board's decision, and the student body president's job would fall to the vice president, Alan Lowden.

As a result of his court case, Fulcher agreed to pay restitution to the victim, perform community service and seek counseling to avoid prosecution.

Transsexual fired for falsifying sex

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) — The state did nothing wrong when it fired a transsexual for failing to reveal on an employment application that he was a man, a judge has ruled.

The state Employment Development Department fired Katherine Rosen in 1989 after learning Rosen was a man and suffered from asthma when hired.

Rosen, 44, had worked for the department for four months as an accounting clerk.

Rosen, who underwent a sex-change operation this year, contended she was fired solely for being a transsexual.

Superior Court Judge Darrel Lewis said Tuesday there was substantial evidence Rosen was fired because of the "intentional and deceptive omissions, not because of her asthma and transsexuality."

Rosen said the decision was "prejudicial bigotry." She said she would appeal.

Paris punks pilfer porcelain plates

PARIS (AP) — A gang of thieves driving expensive cars pushed aside a security guard to steal porcelain plates worth $5,500 hanging from a Christmas sign erected by Limoges.

The theft occurred Tuesday night on the chic Avenue George V, where the famed porcelain maker set up a street-level billboard Monday that read "Merry Christmas In Limoges."

Around 8:30 p.m., about 15 people parked expensive cars near the billboard, pushed aside the lone guard and removed 100 of the 260 plates hung on the sign before residents alerted police.

Slattery visits politics class

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Staff

Kansas representative Jim Slattery, D-Kan., answers questions from students in the U.S. Politics class of Joseph Unekis, professor of political science, Wednesday afternoon in Kedzie Hall. While visiting Manhattan, Slattery held a question-and-answer period with the class.

Politicians are taking advantage of younger generation, representative says

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

American politicians are taking advantage of today's younger generation because it is not voting, Rep. Jim Slattery said.

Slattery, D-Kan., spoke to a U.S. Politics class Wednesday afternoon in Kedzie Hall as part of a question-and-answer session.

"The young people of today are being taken to the cleaners by today's politicians," he said.

Slattery has been traveling throughout the 2nd District this week to talk with his constituents.

"Today's young people need to take personal action," Slattery said. "Freedom is about accepting responsibility to solve our problems. Your generation is sitting on the sidelines."

He said he would like to see more young people get involved in the political process. He also commented on several other topics, including the reorganization of Kansas' Congressional districts, John Sununu's resignation and David Duke.

Slattery also said he will support Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination.

"There are only two people I would support — Clinton and (Mario) Cuomo. But I'm not real happy with Cuomo right now," Slattery said. "Clinton is smart; he talks about the real issues affecting America, like the deficit and health care."

It is important for America to have two strong candidates to choose from in the 1992 election, he said.

When asked what he thought about Duke, Slattery replied, "David Duke is a dangerous demagogue. He is as phony as he can be. It just goes to show you that to get votes in politics today, all you need to be is good-looking, a smooth talker and able to get TV exposure.

"He may very well defeat George Bush in the Republican runoff," he said. "He will do for the Republican Party what George Wallace did for the Democratic Party in the 1960s."

Slattery also commented about Sununu's resignation.

"I don't think the American public gives a hoot who the president's chief of staff is," he said. "I've known Sununu for years, and I think his leaving office is the best thing for the president and for the country."

A new bill that will reorganize the Kansas Congressional districts is of particular concern to Slattery, he said, and it would cause the state to lose one of its congressional seats.

"The state of Kansas will lose 20 percent of its representation in the House of Representatives," Slattery said. "I am doing whatever I can to keep the 2nd District intact."

Pan Am

and several were soon honoring Pan Am tickets.

Most of Pan Am's remaining 7,500 workers were told to stay home unless called in. Passengers who called Pan Am got a recording that said: "We deeply regret that economic circumstances have forced us to take this action."

The demise of Pan Am left the government scrambling to find other carriers to take over abandoned routes into South America and Europe. The Department of Transportation gave the nation's airlines until late afternoon to file for emergency authority to fly the routes and said it might award some of them by today.

United Airlines, the nation's second largest carrier, appeared to be a top candidate to get Pan Am's routes into Latin America, which it had tried to purchase this summer.

United wants to get into that market to compete with the only other U.S. carrier serving it, archrival American Airlines. American said it would like some of Pan Am's Latin American routes but doubted it could get them because of antitrust concerns.

Northwest Airlines was hoping to get the route from Detroit to London, which was part of a package of Pan Am assets Delta had agreed to buy. Northwest's challenge prompted a government review of that route, while Delta secured the rest of the package.

Delta said Wednesday it was not holding out much hope of getting the Detroit-London route.

English GRA appealing gun conviction

46-year-old Griffin pleads innocence in Clay County incident

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Although a K-State education doctoral student was convicted Nov. 27 of pulling a gun on a man at an apartment in Clay County, he maintains his innocence and is planning to appeal.

A Clay County Circuit Court jury recommended a one-year prison term for David Griffin, 46, who is also graduate research assistant.

The judge ordered a pre-sentence investigation to determine the sentence term and set the sentencing date in January.

Griffin allegedly pointed a gun at the head of Michael Gray, 30, of Overland Park in a dispute concerning a woman. Griffin admits to having a gun tucked in his belt but denies ever pointing it at anyone.

The incident occurred at the Gladstone apartment of the woman, Jamie Draper, who knows both Gray and Griffin.

Draper said the incident stemmed from Gray harassing her.

"He has feelings for me that are totally different than my feelings for him. It's like a fatal attraction. He had followed me that night," she said.

Draper also said Griffin was wrongly convicted.

"First of all, he didn't do what they say he did and secondly, the other individual is the person that is wrong," she said. "Clay County is a very white area. The other guy is white. The minute they saw David was black, he was convicted before it even began."

Draper also said she did not think the jury was very attentive.

"One guy was sleeping. They were all white and all older people," she said. "They didn't pay any attention because if they listened to what was said, they never would've convicted him."

report, Griffin said he got scared after the incident at Draper's apartment and hid the gun. Both attorneys said hiding the weapon probably was a key factor in the conviction.

Draper disagreed.

"He admitted that from the very beginning. It was a normal reaction. It's just an easy thing for them to say," she said. "That's not the issue. It's a black, white issue and it always has been."

Michael Holen, dean of education and Griffin's major professor, said the conviction is merely the first round.

"After the pre-sentence investigation, one possibility is that the judge determines there is nothing to be gained by imprisonment and puts David on probation," he said. "It is also the case his attorney will appeal the guilty verdict. Both he and David feel it was not a just verdict. They believe it was incorrect and there were procedural errors in the trial."

Draper concurred. She said the police neglected to have her and Griffin sign their statements regarding the incident.

"In court they tried to say I said something I didn't. They were wrong in their procedure that they have to allow you to read your statement. If you say it's OK then you have to sign it. If it's not signed, it's not valid," she said.

Griffin did not return phone calls to his office and home Wednesday.

Holen said Griffin is still in Manhattan teaching his Foundations of Education class for undergraduate students.

"He's not incarcerated now," Holen said. "I might also say he's an excellent instructor. I'm hopeful that the appeal will be upheld."

Cats coach still on a winning streak

The second time's a charm, and it's well deserved.

K-State football coach Bill Snyder was named the Associated Press Big Eight Coach of the Year for the second consecutive season Wednesday.

Not only did Snyder lead the Wildcats to a comeback 5-6 season a year ago, but he brought the K-State football program even further out of the gutter — and into the limelight — with a 7-4 record this season, the best since 1954. To find another coach with 13 victories in his first three years at K-State, you'd have to go way back to Charles Bachman in 1920-22.

A big, sincere pat on the back goes to this AP coach of the year and his 1991 Wildcats. They've put K-State football back on the map.

Ukraine

Independence opens some doors, may close others

Then there was one.

One superpower, that is. That is what the world said when the Soviet Union disintegrated last August. Events of the past few months have solidified the world's belief the United States is the bar-none world leader.

Meanwhile, amidst the tattered remnants of the Soviet Union, a new power has been on the rise — the Ukraine.

The Ukraine's popular 9-1 vote for outright independence at once brings to the foreground a possible European power broker. The former republic's resources, both human and natural, spell out the rise of a new superpower.

Though the now smaller Soviet Union matches or exceeds the Ukraine in nuclear weapons, oil and gold, only the United States exceeds the new nation in man's most important resource: food.

America has been able to stay on top through food exports, using them to obtain oil and other goods from overseas.

For years, America has had a virtual monopoly on the world food trade, since it has been the only country that could consistently produce a surplus.

The Ukraine, during this same time, was also a food-producing giant, but its food was used to feed the rest of the barren Soviet republics.

The independence of the Ukraine is a sword that cuts both ways. Though it renders our once enemy, the Soviet Union, harmless, the Ukraine can now inflict serious economic damage to the United States through unparalleled food trade competition.

All great empires have been built on the government's ability to feed its people, and America is no exception. Empires have been built on much less than what the Ukraine has to start with, which is all the more reason for the world to take notice.

Americans have no choice but to support the emergence of the new democratic nation. Supporting democracy is what America is here to do.

Ironically, the spread of freedom to the Ukraine might spell the end of the economic freedoms America has now.

Fond farewell

To: John Sununu, White House chief of staff

Goodbye, you fat leech.

Citizens fight efforts to diversify Dubuque

It must have been a hell of a day in Dubuque, Iowa.

Before this year, the river town of almost 60,000 was probably best known for its meat-packing industry. People all across America seemed to like the beef that came from Dubuque. Iowa steaks made you grow up big and strong, and they tasted mm-mm good.

But, though the beef was known worldwide, the town of Dubuque itself remained relatively unknown. That was OK with the citizens. They liked the slow pace of life the city offered.

Dubuque was an all-America type city. Kids played baseball in the summer. Everybody went to church on Sunday and had a big family dinner afterward. Everybody seemed happy and content.

Then somebody had to go and screw it up.

Someone on the Dubuque City Commission noticed there didn't seem to be many black people in Dubuque. There weren't many at the baseball games. There weren't many at church on Sunday.

So after a little research, it came to be known that of Dubuque's almost 60,000 citizens, only 330 were black.

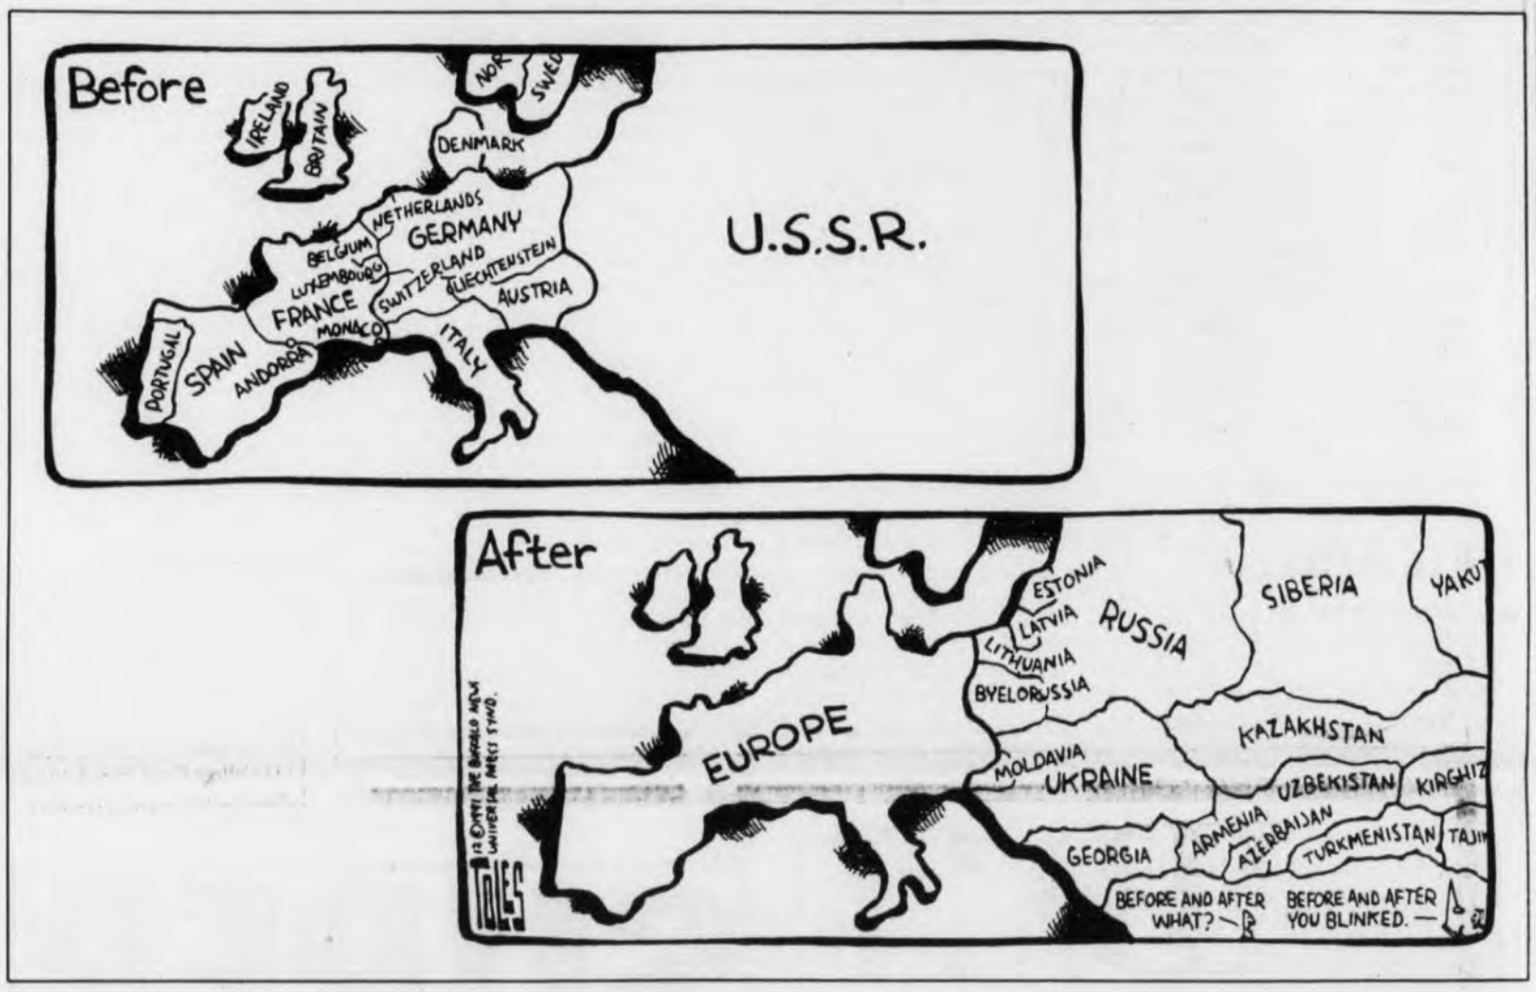
Problem? Well the city commission thought so. So they enacted laws to make Dubuque more attractive to blacks looking for a place to call home. Nothing drastic, just things to help make people feel more at home.

But the city commission didn't realize that the citizens of Dubuque weren't in favor of these steps to help more blacks raise families in the heartland of America.

Oh, the citizens (the 57,470 white ones, anyway) could handle 330 or so blacks, so long as they kept to themselves. But now the damn Negroes will be moving into the neighborhood. They'll lower the damn property values, because everybody knows blacks keep junky yards. And, hell, let's no even mention the drugs they'll brin in.

Suddenly, this all-America town was in an uproar and all of the solid Midwestern values its citizens were known for disappeared. Where were the people who would harvest the crops of a neighbor when he was sick? Where were the people who dropped off a grocery sack of sweet corn, because they had more than they could possibly use?

They were out burning crosses. Ten of them have gone up in flames since July. More will follow.



Last Saturday, 200 people showed up to cheer a Ku Klux Klan national leader who came to the city to speak. It's not known if the participants had a big family dinner afterward.

So what are we left with? The realization that all of those Midwestern values, like, say, treating everyone the same regardless of color, is a myth. In reality, racism is alive and well in the heartland, America's breadbasket or whatever the hell else the Midwest is being called this week.

In Dubuque, the charade seems to have ended. The citizens there don't even appear to care anymore that they come off looking like racist slime. The rallying call in Dubuque is, "White is right."

And sadly, you could take any town like Dubuque, put it in the same situation, and the reaction would be exactly the same. Only the names change.

Like I said, it's a hell of a day.

Bigger picture shows problems

Editor,

Your Dec. 2 AIDS editorial brought up a very interesting point: In speaking of "Bible beaters," you wished, "If only those people understood the whole as well as they did the parts." Well, let me challenge you to consider a bigger picture for a moment.

The whole seems to me to be the problem that Americans have with keeping the marriage bed pure. Premarital, extramarital and homosexual intercourse has resulted in the problems we are now facing — huge number of "unwanted" children mercilessly killed, fatal diseases such as AIDS rising in nightmarish epidemic proportions, statistics that show rising divorce rates, staggering statistics of rape and incest committed to fulfill that over-fed American sex drive. These are problems that affect each and every one of us, regardless of religion.

Long ago the Bible told us to refrain from sexual immorality. Why? Do you think it was because God didn't want us to have any fun or because He knew what our fun would result in and wanted to save us from all harm?

You can encourage people to get tested for AIDS and engage in safer sex all you want. The problems aren't going to go away — not because we're not trying hard enough, but because society is trying to fix something that is the end result of a deep-rooted problem. Who's the one thinking in parts now?

Tenured professors need evaluations, too

Editor,

The Monday issue of the Collegian contained an article titled, "Evaluations provide feedback," which stated that non-tenured instructors are required to be rated by students. These ratings are used to determine salary increases and get input on the instructor's teaching effectiveness. However, a question arises: Why stop the evaluations after tenure?

The article quotes Robert Kruh as saying that tenure is only given to the best person, given the resources available. He fails to note that new "resources" become available each day, and many instructors are bound to be better than the old. Materials, teaching equipment and class content are constantly changing but instructional quality is assumed to remain constant. The situation only gets worse should the unsuccessful instructor rise to the upper ranks of the department. Without student input there is little if any chance of finding out if the students are really learning the information being presented.

I know of several quality tenured instructors who ask for input at the end of the year, and I applaud them. However, I find it is the instructors who fail to ask for evaluations that could benefit from the students' input. I urge every department to require an evaluation of every instructor at least once a semester — if not to keep up the standards of teaching, then to allow the students to praise the quality faculty that deserve a pat on the back.

Activists should re-channel energy

Editor,

If Alan Oberley and Matthew Vajnar were a little more well-read, they would know that Ms. Tivis, who disclosed the information on third-trimester abortions, was a disgruntled employee fired for personal reasons. And her figures on third-trimester abortions have been discredited. Furthermore, Mr. Tiller has a policy of only performing third-trimester abortions when the life of the mother or the fetus is at stake.

The abortion argument has been thoroughly driven into the ground, and it's time people quit wasting their time writing letters to editors and picketing clinics. It's time to use your energies to help single mothers who didn't have an abortion and now can't afford to feed their children or those who are having difficulty raising handicapped children they chose not to abort.

It's time people not only become educated in safe sex, but also practice it. Don't get me wrong, I'd be happy if all abortion clinics closed tomorrow, but I want them to close because teenagers are no longer becoming pregnant, because incest no longer exists and daughters aren't pregnant with their fathers' babies and because men aren't raping women.

Spend your spare time at the homeless shelter, the orphanage or the counseling center, not on the picket line or in front of the typewriter. I urge anyone considering responding to this letter to save their energy and go out and help instead of fighting and arguing, because right now all of society is losing.

Help in fighting poverty appreciated

Editor,

I want to thank the Collegian for the marvelous job of reporting on the issues of hunger and poverty in Manhattan in the Nov. 20 issue of the paper. It is true that the poverty in our community is not as blatant as it is elsewhere in the world, but hunger and poverty do exist here. It is great that the Collegian is helping to bring these issues to light, so that we can work together on solving them.

I was also grateful to see the excellent guest column by Kristi Humston in the Nov. 25 Collegian, which was about creating a K-State Holiday Tree out of canned goods in the K-State Union Courtyard to benefit the Mayor's Holiday Tree food drive. I have always known how wonderful our K-State students are, and this is living proof of that fact. On behalf of everyone connected with the Mayor's Holiday Tree food drive, we thank you for caring for those who are less fortunate.

Finally, I would like to publicly thank coaches Altman, Clark and Yow and all the members of the basketball and baseball teams who took time out of their busy schedules to help distribute the Thanksgiving baskets this year. It warms our hearts to have this kind of caring leadership in our community.

Sacrifices should not be forgotten

Editor,

Fifty years ago, on Dec. 7, a day that then former President Franklin D. Roosevelt called "a day that shall live in infamy," World War II began at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii.

I was 17 years old, a freshman at K-State. It was a shocking and frightening Sunday when it was announced by radio.

The next day, an assembly of the student body was addressed by the president of the University. I remember wondering how many of those young men sitting in the audience might be dead in the year ahead.

Many young men volunteered to go to the conflict; many others were drafted. At any rate, most young male students were gone from this campus in the months that followed.

After four years of hostilities, first in North Africa, then Italy, Germany and finally in the Pacific, the war ended. Such celebrations, such joy, such thanksgiving.

Our youth was spent in sacrificing our strength, courage and money in the defense of a way of life more precious than life itself. Perhaps generations judge one another, but I believe my generation did make the world safer for you.

"God bless America." I can still hear Kate Smith belt it out. It is that vision that many young Americans carried in their minds, and remembering their sacrifices to this nation, we could all be thankful.

Japan to apologize for WWII

Parlimentary resolution not to address 1941 bombing of Pearl Harbor

By the Associated Press

TOKYO—Japan's Parliament will mark the 50th anniversary of Pearl Harbor with an expression of regret for its World War II aggression, but no direct apology for its surprise attack on the U.S. base, sources said Wednesday.

Sources close to last-minute negotiations on the resolution said the measure will be watered down from a stronger statement of responsibility for the war demanded by some opposition parties.

This is partly to appease right-wing members of the governing Liberal Democratic Party who oppose it altogether, said the sources on condition of anonymity.

If correct, the news of a watered-down resolution seemed likely to irk the government, which has been trying to ensure that the anniversary doesn't aggravate U.S.-Japan relations already tense over trade issues.

On Tuesday, Foreign Minister Michio Watanabe expressed "deep remorse over the terrible suffering" Japan inflicted on the United States and Asia and said a resolution was certain to be adopted, calling it "a milestone."

One source in the governing party's leadership, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the resolution's final form might be similar to language in the postwar constitution, which renounces war in abstract terms.

The only reference to Pearl Harbor, he said, might be an acknowledgement that it is being commemorated.

The resolution was being rushed to a Parliament vote, bypassing the normal round of committee debate to adopt it in time for Saturday's anniversary, the sources said.

Japan so far has remembered the war with anniversary observances every Aug. 6 and 9—the days in 1945 when the southern Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki were destroyed by U.S. atomic bombs—and on Aug. 15, the day Japan surrendered.

In an interview with the Washington Post, Watanabe said the Japanese government "isn't seeking any kind of apology" from the United States for the atomic attacks that ended the war. President Bush said last weekend that he would not apologize for America's use of the bombs.

Watanabe also did not offer a specific apology, the Post said, but condemned Japanese actions that led to the war.

"This is the 50th anniversary of Pearl Harbor, and we feel a deep remorse about the terrible suffering and sorrow Japan inflicted on the American people and the peoples of Asia and the Pacific during the Pacific War, a war that Japan started by the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor," Watanabe told the newspaper.

During the past year, former Prime Minister Toshiki Kaifu and Emperor Akihito have offered expressions of regret for Japan's aggression, in part to allay Asian fears that a government proposal to send peacekeeping troops abroad would lead to resurgent militarism.

But Japan's Asian neighbors often have complained that to the extent the Japanese recall the war, those recollections most frequently revolve around Japan as a war victim, not an aggressor.

Automobile-deer accidents increase

Sunrise, sunset prove dangerous driving times

MICHELLE POULIN
Collegian Reporter

Driving on Kansas highways requires extra attention this time of year as the number of deer-related accidents increase.

Both the Riley County Police Department and the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks have noted a great increase in the number of deer being hit.

"More are hit in November and the beginning of December than in any other month," said Chuck Beaver of the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks.

"During the breeding season, the bucks are more active and more likely to run across the road," Beaver said.

The morning and evening hours are the most dangerous, specifically during sunrise and sunset.

"There is usually no warning before you hit a deer," Beaver said. "All I can suggest is to slow down during caution times," RCPD Sgt. Herb Crosby also suggests slowing down as a way to avoid a deer. He said flashing headlights and honking the horn is not a good idea.

"The flashing lights will blind the deer," Crosby said. "A honk, on the other hand, could startle them and cause the deer to turn into someone else's car."

In the event a deer is hit, both Crosby

KPERS awarded emergency funding

State pension program gets boost to aid controversial, troubled investments

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Rejecting the budget director's conclusion that some of the funding did not constitute an emergency, the State Finance Council on Wednesday approved a $98,920 expenditure by the state pension program to beef up its investment monitoring.

The request by the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System Board of Trustees came in the wake of multimillion-dollar losses in risky direct placement and real estate loan programs in recent years.

Those losses total a known $122 million, with another $154 million worth of loans in some degree of jeopardy.

The board asked the Finance Council, made up of Gov. Joan Finney and eight legislative leaders, to approve the increased spending in order to hire a new investment analyst and expand the KPERS staff's computer capability.

State Budget Director Gloria Timmer recommended that $39,495 of the amount be denied. She said it was money for computer equipment not directly related to the KPERS investment loss investigation, and it should go through the regular budget process and be approved by the 1992 Legislature.

"It is basically an operating enhancement," Timmer said. "We could find no reason why it was impacted by the investigations."

However, KPERS Executive Secretary Meredith Williams said the computer equipment was needed to permit his staff to keep up with requests for information related to ongoing investigations by the KBI, FBI and other agencies.

After that, House Speaker Marvin Barkis moved that the entire $98,920 be approved.

"We are unable to meet demands placed on us by our members, given the increased demands placed on us by the various investigators for information," Williams said.

"We basically are falling behind every day in terms of our ability to serve the needs of our 130,000 members, 39,000 retirants ... and the investigators."

Barkis said that sounded like an emergency to him and moved to approve the full funding. His motion was approved on voice vote with no dissent.

"We're not going to deny them (KPERS personnel) the resources they need," Barkis said.

In other action, the Finance Council authorized $82,534 for the Department of Health and Environment to spend additional federal funds on an epidemiological study of lead and cadmium contamination on residents of the Galena area, which is a national Superfund site.

The Council also approved $107,692 for the Department of Commerce to spend additional unused federal matching funds on state housing programs.

It voted to provide $667,632 for the Department of Wildlife and Parks to spend on continued construction at Hillsdale State Park in southern Johnson and northern Miami counties. The 1991 Legislature approved the expenditure, but authorization to spend the money was inadvertently omitted.

Also $40,250 was allocated for the Kansas Banking Department to settle a discrimination case, and $17,500 for Larned State Hospital to settle a medical malpractice case.

Snyder does it again; Sands stands tall

with 2nd coach of the year award

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bill Snyder, whose turnaround of the long-suffering K-State football program has stopped talk of dropping the school out of Division I-A, was named the Associated Press Big Eight Coach of the Year for the second straight season on Wednesday.

In Snyder's second season a year ago, the Wildcats went 5-6, exceeding their victory total for the previous five years combined. But this year they did even better, going 7-4 to match their highest win total in 37 years and mark only their fifth winning record since 1936.

Along the way, they shook one albatross after another off the back of the only major college program with more than 500 losses. With a 37-7 victory at Iowa State, they broke a 30-game road losing streak. The next week, a 32-0 shutout of Missouri, gave the Cats back-to-back victories over Big Eight teams for the first time in 21 years.

Their four conference victories were the most for a K-State team since 1970.

As the losingest program in major college history, there has been talk over the past 10 years of dropping the Cats out of Big Eight football competition.

But all such talk has ceased. Things haven't been this upbeat in the Manhattan since the 1969 Cats scalded Oklahoma 59-21.

"Seven-four is not the ultimate. It's not anything that most coaches are going to jump up and get excited about," Snyder said. "But it was something special to these kids just to have regained their self-respect. I feel very happy for them."

Not many skeptics predicted success, let alone happiness, when Snyder followed the fired Stan Parrish into what had been a coach's graveyard. The Cats had won a total of two games the previous three years, and one of the first things Snyder did was visit with the graduating seniors.

The conversations shocked and disturbed him.

"I was amazed at how their lives had been changed and how it had affected their futures," he said. "Not their futures in football, but in other areas. That's what all the losing had done to them. They were truly stamped-down people. That night I went home almost in a state of depression I felt so bad for those kids."

Bill Snyder

More than once during this turnaround season, Snyder's thoughts drifted back to those seniors who were not able to go out as winners.

"I have some real strong feelings toward those seniors who left us after the 1989 and 1990 seasons because they were young people who were involved in building the foundation," he said. "They were young guys who helped this program take some steps.

KU tailback edges McCant for player of year

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Tony Sands, a thimble-sized running back from KU who closed his career by smashing the NCAA single-game rushing record, edged Nebraska quarterback Keithen McCant by one vote Wednesday for Associated Press Big Eight offensive player of the year.

Tony Sands

Joe Bowden

The 5-foot-6, 175-pound Sands, who led the Big Eight in rushing but hopes to work for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency instead of the NFL, collected six votes from a panel of 16 media observers. McCant, who emerged from obscurity to top the Big Eight in passing and lead the Huskers to a share of the league title, had five.

Oklahoma linebacker Joe Bowden, the best player on the Big Eight's toughest defense, was an easy winner for AP defensive player of the year.

Colorado quarterback Darian Hagan had three votes for offensive player honors. Derek Brown of Nebraska and Mike Gaddis of Oklahoma each had one.

Calvin Jones, Nebraska's big, fast redshirt freshman who gained 294 yards and scored six touchdowns in one game, was an overwhelming winner in voting for offensive newcomer of the year. For defensive newcomer, voters chose KU freshman linebacker Steve Harvey.

Sands' choice was no doubt a surprise to many observers despite his many achievements. For sure, others are bigger and faster than the little Kansan, who also is admired for being a good student and model citizen.

"I'm sure some of those guys are better players, but there's not a better story than that kid," KU coach Glen Mason said. "I think he's healthy for college football. We're not supposed to be a breeding ground for the NFL."

A Fort Lauderdale, Fla., native who could not interest any of the Southeastern powers because of his size, Sands was one of the first recruits Mason signed when he took over the fledgling Jayhawk team. He went on to lead KU in rushing four straight years and set a swarm of school records, including most yards rushing in a season and in a career and most touchdowns.

He led the Big Eight this year with 1,442 yards, averaging almost 132 per game.

But he saved his best for last. Against a Missouri defense weakened by injury, Sands carried an NCAA-record 58 times for an NCAA-record 396 yards in a 53-29 season finale victory that gave the Jayhawks (6-5) their first winning season in a decade.

Still, Sands' size no doubt will scare off many pro scouts.

"If they're worried about him holding up, they don't have to be," Mason said. "I've seen him take some of the toughest hits anybody ever took."

Some of the toughest hits anybody

Koch's priorities shift from course to classroom

European champ wants to design what she plays

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

Day or night, there's a good chance of finding her at her desk in the Seaton Hall studio, working diligently.

But Martina Koch, graduate student in landscape architecture, hasn't made a name for herself drawing blueprints.

Koch, a native of Garbsen, Germany, is one of the best amateur golf players in the world. She won the European Championships in France in 1986 and in Switzerland four years later. Koch also placed fifth with the German National Team at the Team World Championships earlier this year in New Zealand.

With the second gold medal hanging around her neck, Koch decided to change the priorities in her life. After six years of intensive golf and a bachelor's degree from the University of Arizona, where she played from 1986 to '90, Koch placed K-State's graduate school above all other options.

"After finishing college work at Arizona and winning the title for the second time, I had the opportunity to become a professional golfer," Koch said. "But I just didn't want that at this time. After four years at Arizona, I had no motivation left to continue. Golf was no longer fun, and I just couldn't see myself traveling from one tournament to another all the time.

"I believe, thinking in the long term, having a master's degree in my hands is the better way to go."

Koch, who also had opportunities to work in the United States or Germany, transferred to K-State because of the quality of the landscape architecture program, particularly in the area of golf course construction.

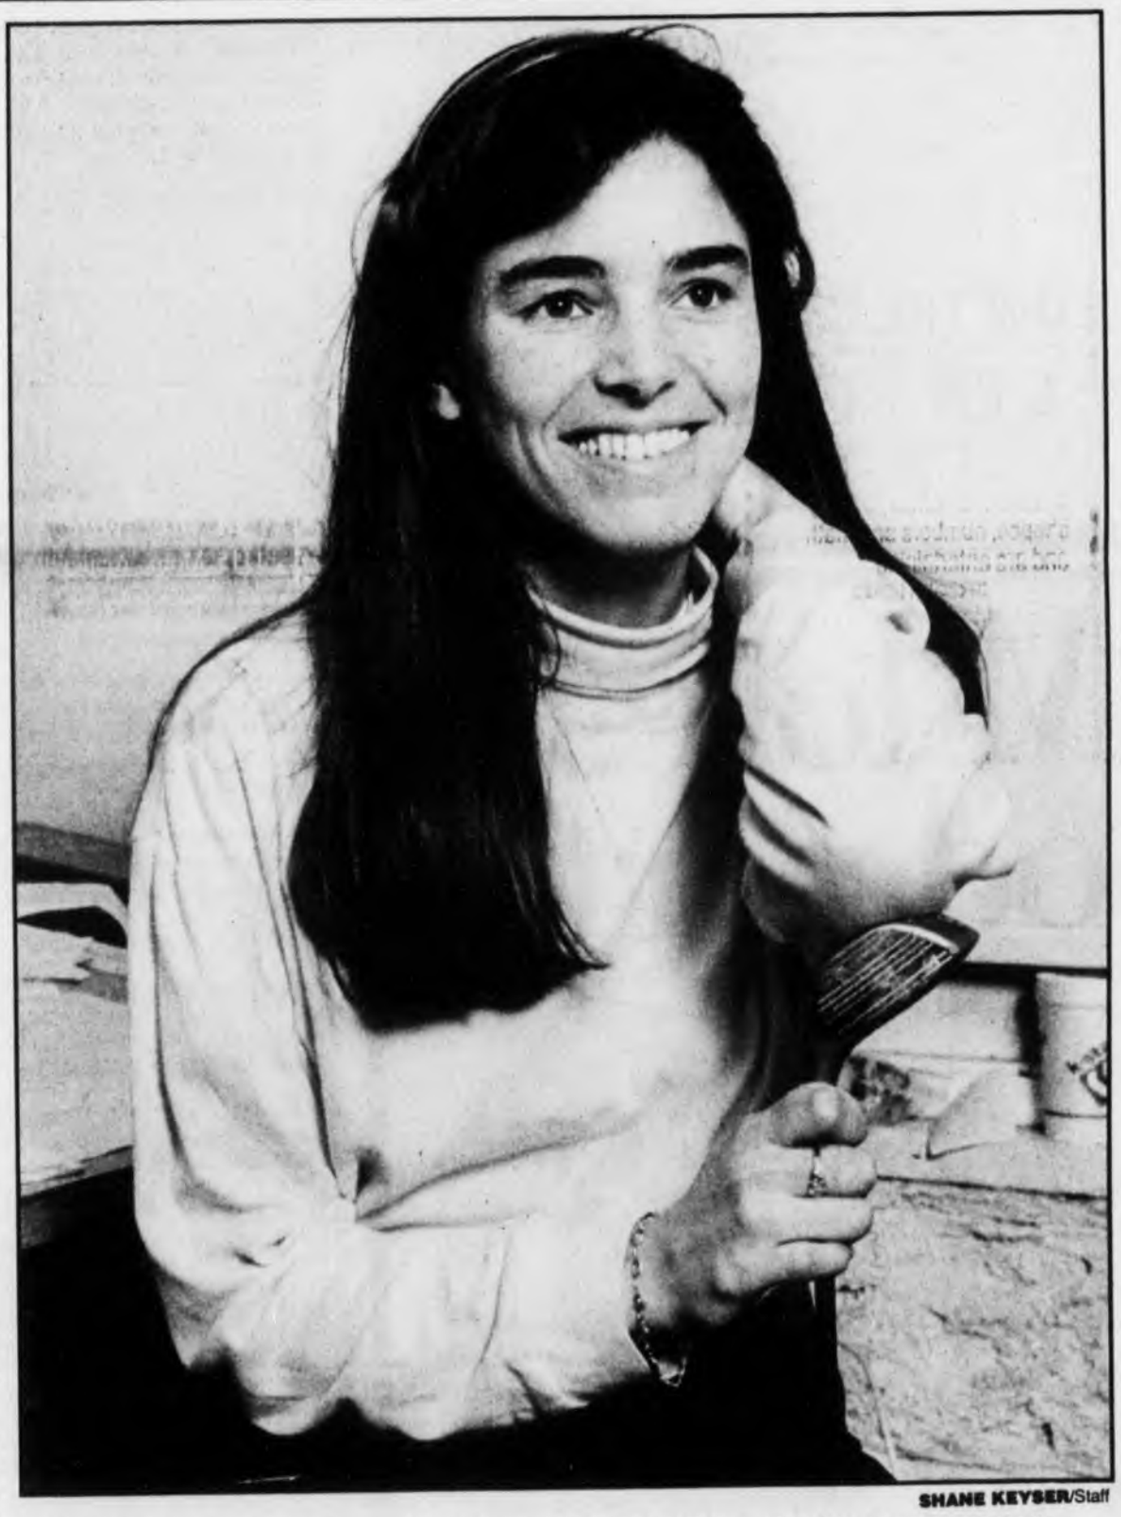
The program is not only profitable, Koch said, but it requires a lot of time — enough to force her to put her golf clubs in the corner.

"During the semester, I have no time to play golf," she said.

The lack of practice time made for a surprising finish at the tournament in New Zealand.

"It was amazing how we played," Koch said. "We were second after two days and third after three. We had the course memorized in our heads. We came best prepared for the tourney. But somehow, we didn't play that well on the last day."

Even more unexpected was Koch's European title in 1990. Her first title came after extensive practice with her father and coach, Horst. The second one was with virtually no practice.



"I was really surprised that I won that championship," she said. "I couldn't practice as well in Arizona as I used to because we played many tournaments. I didn't play well, but consistent."

Koch said she never thought she could win until the middle of the final round.

"I'd have been glad if I had finished under the best 10. But on the last four holes, the other players in front of me started to make mistakes, and I played some good shots."

Despite earning All-America honors at Arizona, Koch said she thinks that period of her career wasn't her best.

"I won only two tournaments in the four years," she said. "I think I learned to play more consistently, and I gathered tournament experience. However, I don't think I've improved my golf."

Martina Koch, a two-time winner of the European amateur golf championship, is now a graduate student in landscape architecture. Her golf career is on hold until she finishes her master's degree.

Golfers continue climb

Elliott wants consistency in spring season

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

After an early season slump, the men's golf team concluded the fall half of their season on a positive note by stringing together three strong performances.

GOLF

The first segment of the semester saw the squad's tournament title hopes go down the drain during the first-round of the initial three tournaments. At those meets — the U.C. Ferguson All-College meet at Oklahoma City, Okla., the Kansas Invitational and the Falcon Invitational at Colorado Springs, Colo. — the team turned in four-man team scores of 310, 317 and 331.

The fact that there were 10 or more teams in front of them after the first-round overshadowed the fact that the second and third rounds were competitive.

At Oklahoma City, the team finished with scores of 293 and 294 to place 11th out of 17 teams. At KU, it posted scores of 306 and 315, placing it 13th out of 15 teams. At the Air Force tournament, K-State put together back-to-back 307's, good for 10th place out of 23 teams.

As the season progressed, K-State picked up the pace and the Wildcats carried a string of seven straight rounds under 310 and five straight under 305 into the spring season.

In that stretch, they placed second out of 10 teams at Iowa State, eighth out of 14 teams at the tough Texas International Golf Championships and fifth out of 15 teams at the finale, the Jaguar Classic in Augusta, Ga.

Although the season ended with better play, Coach Mark Elliott is still haunted by the early-season problems.

"I'd say we're a little behind where we'd hope to be," Elliott said. "(Richard) Laing played reasonably well all year, but we had no consistency from anyone else. However, we're not far from being a good team."

Laing echoed his coach's comments, sighting increased dedication as a key to success in the spring.

"We had a team meeting at the end of the year," Laing said. "We got down to the nitty-gritty and really talked things over.

"We have improved, not just from the first of the season, but from last year. We have eliminated the really bad scores and now we need to take the next step forward and shoot some good scores. We have a lot of talent on this team that isn't being exposed right now."

Everyone from last season's team returned this year. The increased depth and talent on this year's squad allowed Elliott to implement qualifying tournaments before each trip. He was disappointed with the way his club responded to the trials.

The team's No. 2 player, Jim Brenneman, failed to qualify once. Seniors Bill Graham and Brett

Pirates fear Bonds' price tag too high

Management looks for trade after Bonilla deal

By the Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — As former team president Carl Barger refused to take the blame for Bobby Bonilla's departure, Pittsburgh Pirates general manager Larry Doughty began his Christmas season Wednesday by shopping Barry Bonds.

Doughty spent a busy day on the phone, determining which — if any — West Coast teams are interested in trading for Bonds, who can become a free agent next year.

Now that Bonilla's record $29 million contract with the New York Mets has set Bonds' market value at $6 million-plus a year, the Pirates apparently are convinced they can't afford to sign Bonds and are better off trading him.

Doughty is prepared to open trade talks even before next week's winter meetings in Miami, and Bonds' agent, Rod Wright, isn't complaining.

"If the Pirates are not in position to pay Barry his market value, it would be suicidal to keep him all year and settle for draft picks," Wright said.

But even as he prepared to deal Bonds, Doughty remained convinced the Pirates shouldn't have lost Bonilla — and perhaps, Bonds, too, should Bonilla's deal hasten Bonds' departure.

In an uncharacteristically harsh rebuke of the Pirates' high-echelon management, Doughty said he repeatedly urged ownership to sign Bonilla to a long-term deal last winter, when the asking price was millions less.

"If our organization had done what I said last year, Bobby would have been signed. I told them before we took him to arbitration, 'Let's sign him. He wants to stay here. He's obviously a very important member of our team. Let's get it done'" Doughty said. "My recommendations weren't regarded very highly in the previous regime."

Barger, now the president of the expansion Florida Marlins, said he wasn't the villain and instead shifted the blame higher in the organization, apparently to board chairman Douglas Danforth and the board of directors.

"What Larry said floored me ... the inference in his statement was anything but reality," Barger said. "Larry and I spent days weighing the alternatives trying to get Bobby signed."

Bonilla rejected the Pirates' four-year, $16 million offer last March and, later, a sweetened $16.8 million proposal.

"I was told we could go $16.8 (million) for four years and not one penny more. I had no ability to go to five years," Barger said. "It was ironclad, we absolutely would not go to five years. Dennis (Gilbert, Bonilla's agent) said we weren't even in the ballpark."

Gilbert said he would have accepted the Pirates' recent offer of $18.5 million if it had been made during the season, but Barger doubts that.

"When we offered $16.8 million, I thought maybe we could do a deal, but Dennis told me, 'Carl, I appreciate the offer, but we aren't even in the same ballpark, you're leap years away,' " Barger said. "That stuff is easy to say now. At the time, he offered no response, no counter offer.

"I think he made the decision months before to test the free agent market and he used us to up the ante."

And as Doughty and the Pirates weigh life without Bobby Bo, Bonilla wonders how good the Pirates would be without Bonds, the 1990 National League MVP and the 1991 runner-up.

"They'll get four players for him, but they'll never replace him," Bonilla told The Pittsburgh Press.

Baseball's Top 10

Bobby Bonilla's signing of a five-year deal with the New York Mets on Tuesday made him baseball's highest-paid player. Here are the top 10 current annual salaries.

1) Bobby Bonilla, NY Mets — $5,800,000
2) Roger Clemens, Boston — $5,380,250
3) Dwight Gooden, NY Mets — $5,150,000
4) Jose Canseco, Oakland — $4,700,000
5) Andy Van Slyke, Pittsburgh — $4,216,667
6) Nolan Ryan, Texas — $4,200,000
7) Tony Gwynn, San Diego — $4,083,333
8) Darryl Strawberry, Los Angeles — $4,050,000
9) Tom Candiotti, Los Angeles — $3,875,000
10) Don Mattingly, NY Yankees — $3,860,000

Big 8 excited about 'Big Monday' coverage

Altman says recruiting aided by new time slot in triple-header

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Ask Wildcat radio announcer Mitch Holthus to describe the Big Eight's move to ESPN's Big Monday, and he might reply that it's a big, big, big, big improvement.

ESPN's scheduling of basketball conference matchups influences the reputation of conferences and colleges across the nation. In the past few years, prominence in college basketball has probably been affected more by ESPN's broadcasts than any other factor.

The sports network compiles the most comprehensive schedule of college basketball broadcasts on television, attracting viewers with its diversity in showcasing teams through double and tripleheader coverage. This season, the network will air more than 200 men's contests featuring 118 teams.

As would be expected, conferences and individual schools will go out of their way to accommodate ESPN scheduling. Matchups between top-ranked non-conference opponents are tailored just to land a spot on national television. After the conference season begins in January, a regular lineup featuring teams from the most prominent conferences packs the weeknight schedule.

The Big Eight held a time slot on Tuesday nights at 6:30 p.m. for several seasons as part of the weekly schedule. ESPN appearances helped bring recognition to the conference, but it was not seen as one of the premier time slots.

This season, however, a switch was made with the Big Ten conference that moves the Big Eight into the middle position of the Big Monday tripleheader, flanked by Big East and Big West contests. The position is viewed by coaches and conference directors as the best spot in the lineup.

"If the sentiment we're getting from around the conference is a true indication, everyone involved feels there is an advantage to being on Monday," Big Eight assistant commissioner Tim Allen said. "It places us in a better position to be seen on both coasts and with the Big East, one of the nation's most respected conferences, as a lead-in, we are on when a greater number of people are tuned in."

A series of nine conference matchups, featuring each Big Eight school at least once, will start Jan. 6 with K-State at Oklahoma State.

The new position in the ESPN lineup will improve the conference's standing on the national level, K-State athletic director Milt Richards said.

"The Big Eight has always been a highly respected basketball conference, but it doesn't always seem to get the coverage that some others do," Richards said. "This year, the conference was voted by several publications as the best in the nation. And with the success of Big Eight teams in past years, the conference deserves equitable coverage. The Big Monday spot should help to bring that.

"I once asked John Chaney (basketball coach at Temple University, where Richards served in athletic administration for nine years) what he would do with a check that he could spend in any way to improve his program. He said he would buy more TV time. Having a team appear on television means improved revenue and image for the entire university."

Allen said the Big Ten requested a move to an earlier position because a portion of its area is in the eastern time zone, where tip-off of the Monday games was seen at 9:30 p.m. Because the early Monday and Wednesday positions were taken by eastern conferences, the spot held by the Big Eight was the best available.

"This puts us in the Midwest prime time, a much better spot for our local audiences than 6:30 on Tuesday," Allen said. "It's not too late to be seen on the East Coast, and is just starting when recruits on the West Coast are coming in from practice."

BIG MONDAY ESPN

Beginning in January on ESPN, a Big Eight game will be featured every Monday as part of a triple-header with the Big East and Big West conferences. All of the following games will begin at 8:30 p.m.

January	6	K-State at Oklahoma St.
	13	KU at Missouri
	20	Oklahoma St. at Oklahoma
	27	Oklahoma at Nebraska
February	3	K-State at KU
	10	Colorado at Iowa St.
	17	Nebraska at Missouri
	24	Oklahoma at KU
March	2	Oklahoma St. at KU

The chance to use ESPN broadcasts as a recruiting tool was one of the most appealing factors of the move to Monday nights. Big Eight coaches agreed recruits didn't see many Tuesday night performances because high school games are often played on Tuesdays.

"Our Tuesday night time was not a good one on the West Coast," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "I know a lot of the Big Eight programs recruit on the West Coast. And since Tuesday is high school night, those kids couldn't see the Big Eight as often for those two reasons.

"Playing on Saturday and Tuesday is better for preparation. You get an extra day to prepare for your next opponent. But from a purely recruiting standpoint, Monday night is much better."

ever delivered came from the 6-0, 230-pound Bowden. The Sooners led the Big Eight in every defensive category, and Bowden led the team in tackles a second straight year with 127. He also made two interceptions and returned both for touchdowns.

"I guess I would say God has given me a talent that I'm trying to display," said Bowden, who is on course to graduate next spring with a degree in communications.

Bowden joins Dante Jones and Brian Bosworth as Oklahoma linebackers who have been honored since 1985 as the Big Eight's top defender.

"There have obviously been some good linebackers here and Joe Bowden fits right in that mold," Oklahoma linebackers coach Johnny Barr said.

Harvey was one of the most highly sought recruits KU has signed in years and the 6-4, 235-pounder met all expectations. Starting the last eight games, he had 44 tackles and 32 assists, caused four fumbles and had one interception.

"For a true freshman, he played awfully well," Mason said. "We think he has a tremendous career ahead of him at KU. Right now, he's just a big, raw talent."

Many regard the 5-11, 205-pound Jones as the best running back to emerge from a Nebraska high school since Gale Sayers. The Omaha, Neb., native played behind Brown, a first-team All-Big Eight selection, but came off the bench when Brown got hurt against KU and carried 27 times for a school-record 294 yards and a Big Eight-record six touchdowns.

It was the second-highest total ever by a Division I-A freshman, topped only by the 386 San Diego State's Marshall Faulk had earlier this year, and which Sands bested for the NCAA single-game mark. Jones ended up with a Big Eight freshman record 900 yards on 108 carries, a whopping 8.3 yards-per-carry. He scored 14 touchdowns.

"He certainly has all the ability you can ask a back to have," said assistant head coach Frank Solich. "He's got somewhat deceiving speed because he's so big. I don't think people feel he's moving quite as quickly as he is, especially with his smooth running style."

Yet, as much as I want them to understand that, I know it's hard for them to realize and appreciate."

The 1991 Cats won their last three games, the first time a K-State team turned that trick since 1934. And to find a K-State coach with 13 victories in the first three years, you have to go back further still — to Charles Bachman in 1920-22.

"We understand where we are. We know there are still many steps to take because we're still a long way from where we want to be," Snyder said. "I feel comfortable that we've taken many steps, that we've made strides. We've done what we attempted to do in the first years."

Snyder received seven and one-half votes from a panel of sports writers and sportscasters who regularly cover the Big Eight. Colorado's Bill McCartney got three and a half votes. Tom Osborne, whose Nebraska team tied Colorado for the league title, had three votes. Glen Mason, who led KU to a 6-5 finish for the Jayhawks' first winning season since 1981, got two votes.

K-State only Big 8 school with free laundry services

University, students disagree over availability of appliances

VALERIE HEARON
Collegian Reporter

Though some students may think there is a shortage of dryers in the residence halls, statistics prove otherwise.

There are adequate facilities for the funds available, Maintenance Superintendent Gene Wiley said.

"There are 101 washers and 74 dryers in the residence halls, including Smurthwaite House. This gives a total of 165 washers and 98 dryers for all of housing, including Jardine Terrace Apartments."

K-State is the only university in the Big Eight that buys the washers and dryers. All others lease or contract, Wiley said.

K-State is also the only university in the Big Eight that provides free laundry services, and because of that, it is difficult to get enough money to buy more, Wiley said.

The money that comes from the residence hall contracts goes to maintain and upkeep the equipment that is already here.

Washers and dryers are very expensive, he said.

For the 165 washers and 98 dryers here, the cost was $90,972 and $62,683 respectively. Each washer is about $551, and each double-stacked dryer is about $1047. This may seem high for washers and dryers, but the housing department buys all Maytag equipment, which is one of the best on the market.

The appliances last about 12-14 years, considering that the machines run approximately 18 hours a day. That averages out to be about 28 minutes for a wash and 20 minutes for a dry.

Statistics show that there is one washer per 42 students, and one dryer per 50 students.

David Strange, sophomore in arts and sciences, undecided, claims that there is a shortage of dryers, regardless of what the university says.

"It is hard when it takes only 20 minutes to wash and up to an hour to dry. It gets really backed up," Strange said.

Jardine is the only housing that has to pay for the services. Residents are charged 35 cents for a wash and 15 cents for a dry.

There hasn't been any talk of charging residences in the dorms for the services, Wiley said.

Strange and some other students, however, feel that charging residents for laundry services is ridiculous.

Norplant introduced to Kansas

First new birth control method in U.S. in 30 years; used widely in other countries

CARY HASSELL
Collegian Reporter

The University of Kansas Medical Center is the first institution in the Kansas City region designated to introduce Norplant, the first new birth control method in 30 years, and to train other physicians in its insertion.

Norplant System will be released to 90 major medical centers in the United States during the first week of February.

Dr. Kris Neuhaus, staff physician at Lafene Health Center, will be one of the physicians in charge of the Norplant insertions.

"Norplant is a birth control method that literally allows women to forget about it," Neuhaus said. "The benefits definitely outweigh any minor problems that can occur with Norplant."

Norplant is a reversible, five-year, low-dose, progestin-only contraceptive. It consists of six soft, flexible Silastic capsules that are placed in a fan-like pattern under the skin of the upper arm. Each capsule is 1.3 inches long.

Julie Strickland, assistant of gynecology and obstetrics at KU Medical Center, will be training physicians from other teaching hospitals during the first stage of Norplant's introduction. Strickland received her training in Norplant insertion from Dr. Philip Darney, director of the Family Planning Clinic at San Francisco General Hospital, where trial studies were conducted.

Strickland said insertion training will follow three phases. The first is aimed at teaching hospitals. The second phase is for community obstetricians-gynecologists, and the third is for all physicians and health practitioners involved in family planning.

"Contraception occurs within 24 hours of Norplant insertion and is 99.7 percent effective," Strickland said. "There is a return to fertility within one month after its removal."

Norplant has an advantage over birth control methods that require the user to participate, such as remembering to take a pill or putting in a diaphragm. As opposed to permanent sterilization, Norplant allows a woman to change her mind about additional children.

Norplant, which was approved by the Food and Drug Administration in December 1990, will be released on the market by its manufacturer, Wyeth-Ayerst, the first week of February.

The device prevents pregnancy by continuously releasing a synthetic hormone, levonorgestrel, that inhibits ovulation, so eggs will not be produced regularly. The hormone also thickens cervical mucus, which makes it more difficult for the sperm to reach the egg. It contains no estrogen, which has been related to many side effects caused by the pill.

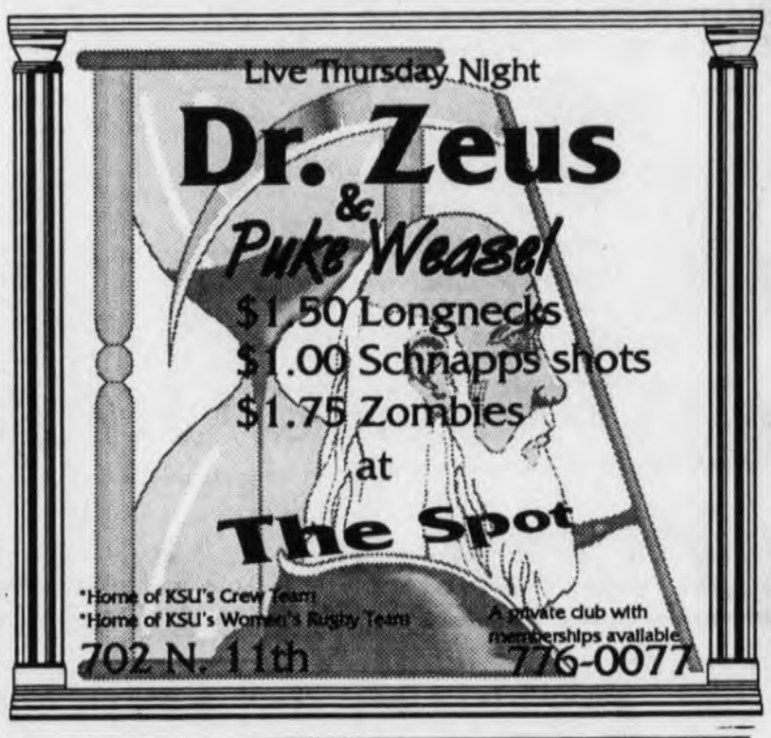
The most common complaint associated with Norplant in the San Francisco trials was menstrual irregularity — prolonged periods, absence of periods and irregular spotting. But those side effects often lessen after six months of use, Strickland said.

Studies done in Egypt, Finland and Indonesia have produced the same results.

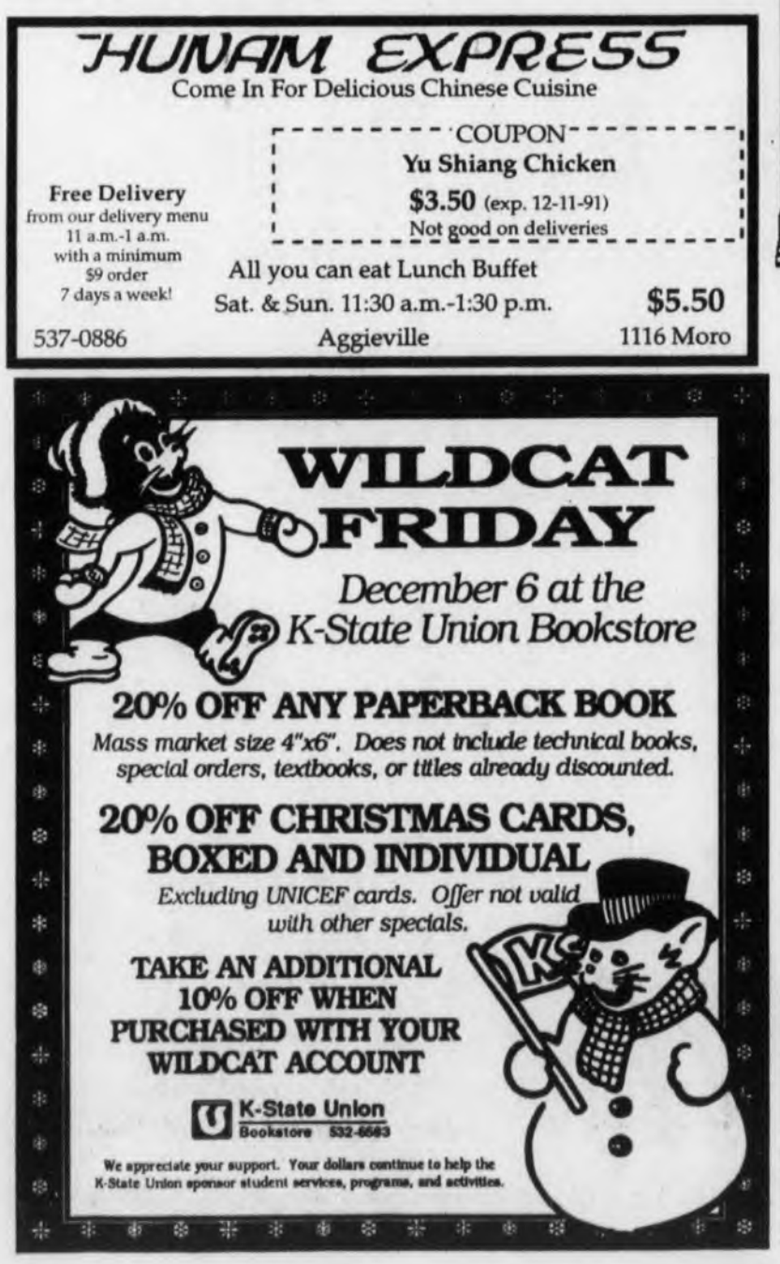
"Norplant is not recommended for women who desire pregnancy in the near future," Strickland said. "It should not be used for women with active liver disease or for women with a history of blood clots or breast cancer."

Neuhaus said Norplant will cost an average of $350 for five years, and there is an insertion fee of $150 and a $75 fee for removal — a total five-year cost comparable to that of oral contraceptives. Women who have insurance that covers the costs of prescriptions can have the initial $350 covered.

"Although Norplant has recently been given approval for distribution in the United States, it is not new," Strickland said. "Norplant has been used on more than 55,000 women for 20 years in 13 countries, and it has been tested in the United States on 1,000 women during the last 10 years."



Revolution in birth control



- The Norplant system is a reversible, five year, low dose, progestin-only contraceptive that is implanted.
- The Norplant system is a contraceptive option that offers convenience, comfort, reversibility and long-term effectiveness. It may be a particularly good option for a woman who:
  - •Is considering sterilization but is not ready to make a final decision
  - •Wants to avoid daily contraceptive use or coitus-related contraceptive methods
  - •Wants long-term reversible contraception
  - •Does not wish to use an estrogen-containing contraceptive

AIDS quilt to Manhattan

NAMES Project remembers AIDS victims; $6,500 needed to to bring quilt in late February

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Health educators plan to raise $6,500 to bring the AIDS Memorial Quilt to Manhattan Feb. 28-March 1. The quilt is a symbol of the NAMES Project, founded in San Francisco in 1987 to commemorate the lives of AIDS victims.

According to a NAMES Project fact sheet, as of June 1991, the quilt included more than 14,000 3-by-6 foot panels and was large enough to cover 5.6 football fields.

Each panel has been handmade by friends, family members, or companions of people who have died of AIDS and has been designed as memorial to an individual.

Although panels must meet certain specifications, panel makers are virtually unlimited in their choice of materials. Some of the more unusual elements which have been added to the quilt include Barbie dolls, corsets, cremation ashes and credit cards. Photographs, stuffed animals and wedding rings have also been used.

Once individual panels have been completed, they are shipped to San Francisco where volunteers sew them into 12-by-12 foot sections. Many sections are combined to make a quilt display.

The NAMES Project requests letters from the panel makers telling about the person being remembered. Panel makers may also submit a list of places where they would like to see their panel displayed. According to the fact sheet, panel requests for specific displays will be honored, whenever possible, if received in writing 45 days prior to a display.

Health Educator Reita Currie said she is open to suggestions as to what panels to request for the K-State display. She said she would like to include memorials to Kansans.

Currie said she hopes to bring up to 100 panels to K-State.

"A logistics committee will determine how many panels we can accommodate," Currie said.

Part of the cost involved in bringing the display to Manhattan is paying for a NAMES Project coordinator to review the plans and look over the site Currie said. She has already received preliminary approval for the quilt to be displayed at Ahearn Field House, but final approval is pending the physical inspection.

Currie said she hopes the quilt will educate the community about the cares and concerns of AIDS victims and their families and raise awareness of the epidemic's overall cost to society.

"We're all being affected by increased health care costs and taxes," Currie said. "It affects each and every one of us, even though we're not HIV-positive."

Students, especially, have a hard time facing the reality of the disease, she said.

"They act like it won't happen to me; I am invincible," Currie said.

She said she would like to see the entire community get involved in bringing the quilt to K-State. A 10-member host committee, made up of individuals from the University and the community will coordinate the event, but they will need a lot of volunteers, Currie said.

Residence halls are raising money, and various campus organizations, including the Peer AIDS Educators, have also volunteered to help.

Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing and dining services, said the residence halls hope to raise $700-$800 to transport the quilt to K-State.

She said the NAMES project will review K-State's application to view the quilt in January and hopes the quilt will be able to be viewed here during Condom Sense Week and Black History Month since blacks are among groups hardest hit by the disease so far.

"Education and awareness will be emphasized in the showing of the quilt," she said.

AIDS quilt facts

- The quilt has 14,000 panels, each representing an AIDS victim.
- Included on the quilt are panels for Liberace, Rock Hudson and Ryan White.
- The quilt has raised $934,704 for direct services for people with AIDS.

Laing, a junior, ushered out 1991 with three top 10 finishes in six tournaments. He was fourth at the Falcon Invitational, fifth at the Iowa State Cyclone Classic and seventh at Augusta.

Elliott said Laing, who averaged 74.5, hoped to be down around 72 or 73 strokes per round and was disappointed about his year. Laing qualified for the NCAA tournament as a freshman by averaging 75.9.

"I know that I'm playing about two strokes better than then," Laing said. "But I don't look at it like that. This year I wasn't winning the tournaments that I was in contention to win. I'm excited for the spring. This fall, I struggled and still only lost tournaments by about three strokes, so I know that I'm just about there when I play well."

The Cats enter the off-season with an average of 306.5 after defeating more than half of the teams they faced in tournaments.

Brenneman struggled at the latter part of the fall slate, but showed signs of starting to get things put together in the final tourney after he shot a 73, Elliott said.

"Very seldom does Jim lose it all," Elliott said. "He's a scrapper and he fights hard."

Graham averaged a 78.2, but that was inflated by a poor showing at KU. Elliott pointed to Graham as a player that the Cats need to play a little better.

Another important player for the Cats is Vuillemin, who Elliott said is probably the team's best driver.

"He's lost a lot of confidence in his game," Elliott said. "He just needs to take his ball striking ability out on the course with him."

On the other side of the slate are freshman Brett Waldman and sophomore David Sedlock, both of whom averaged under 80 at 79.7 and 77.7.

"Sedlock had a good spring," Elliott said. "He has the talent to really help us a lot.

"Waldman, as a freshman, had some really bad rounds, and still kept his average under 80."

The squad's other players that saw action, sophomores Chad Judd, Sean Robertson and Will Siebert, all struggled, but Elliott said they have bright futures at K-State.

Quilt represents reality of AIDS

Students visit quilt in Wichita, see first hand immensity of HIV epidemic

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Students who visited the AIDS Memorial Quilt display in Wichita got a big dose of reality as 1,000 panels were unfolded Saturday at the Century II Exhibition Hall.

"It was so incredible to look at those panels and realize that each one represents someone — a person — someone that someone else knew and loved," said Justine Crawforth, sophomore in business.

She said the event was one of the most memorable things in her life, and that it probably would be for a long time.

Paul Cunnick, senior in radio-television, attended the opening ceremony with his girlfriend, who placed a panel in remembrance of her brother who died of AIDS a year ago. Hers was one of more than 100 panels added that day, Cunnick said.

As he made his way down to the floor to take some pictures, Cunnick's eyes met those of others returning to their seats after presenting their panels. Cunnick said it was even more emotional than he expected, but that it was a good release.

"I got an unbelievable sense of a lot of people coming home at last," he said.

Crawforth said that the ceremony was well-planned and went off without a hitch. As the quilt was slowly opened up, people took turns reading the names of those who had died. The name-reading continued throughout the display, she said.

Cunnick said as he toured the display, some of the panels brought tears to his eyes. Others made him smile.

"They were parts of people's lives. They contained a lot of inside jokes and the punchlines to others," he said.

There was also a blank section where people wrote whatever they wanted. Cunnick said his girlfriend left a message there.

Steven Osborn, freshman in pre-physical therapy, made the trip with members of the Peer AIDS Educators. He said seeing the quilt helped put AIDS into perspective and demonstrated the seriousness of the epidemic. The size of the display, along with the list of victims which was read, made him realize how many people had been hurt by the disease.

Osborn said it moved him to see how much time had obviously been spent creating each panel.

Crawforth said people laid flowers on the panels of people they knew, and some mothers and fathers saw their loved one's panel for the first time. There were people there with the HIV virus, she said.

The quilt was an inspiration to keep fighting for AIDS research, she said, and for the rights of people with AIDS.

Cunnick said since finding out his girlfriend's brother had AIDS, he has come to understand more about the disease. He said he wants to make others understand, too.

"People need to start taking this serious," Cunnick said. "There are 1.5 million positive for HIV."

Manhattan mall filled with trees

Christmas tree auction benefits Big Lakes Development

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan Town Center is lined with Christmas trees this week.

The sixth annual Festival of Trees auction, which benefits the Big Lakes Development Center, will be Dec. 8.

Big Lakes, a non-profit organization, provides programs for developmentally disabled people, such as teach them basic tasks like telling time. Other programs involve contract work for Manhattan businesses.

Big Lakes organizes a janitorial service and lawn-care service in Manhattan, which are staffed by the center's clients.

The Festival of Trees is one way these programs are funded.

Manhattan Town Center has been adorned with the 30 trees and nine wreaths for the festival since Tuesday.

The trees and wreaths were donated by Manhattan organizations and businesses. Each tree is different and reflects the taste of its donor.

Some are elaborate, others more simple. Some are tall, others short. Some are artificial, others real.

"But they are all gorgeous," said Ilene Adams, Big Lakes public relations supervisor.

The trees will be displayed at the Manhattan Town Center until Sunday evening, when they will be auctioned.

There will be a reception featuring the Manhattan Christian College Celebration Singers and Inspiration Ringers, 4-H clowns, Santa Claus and a pianist at 7:30 p.m. Sunday in the mall. The auction will be at 8 p.m.

This year is the first time tickets to the reception and auction will be available to the public. Tickets are $7.50 per person.

In the past, auction attendance has been by invitation only.

"We're trying to reach more people this year," Adams said. "We want everybody to come down."

Many businesses and banks in Manhattan buy trees every year.

Adams said she thinks supporting the festival is a way for people to give something back to Big Lakes.

"It's a really good cause," Adams said. "And this is a time for giving."

Members of Alpha Pi Mu and Circle K International are selling auction tickets and assisting with Sunday's activities.

Chimes Junior Honorary donated a tree to the festival and helped set up and decorate the mall Tuesday night.

"We feel it's a worthy cause. And for the members, it's a lot of fun," said Jim Persinger, junior in political science and Chimes community service coordinator.

Adams said she encourages everyone to come experience the Festival of Trees.

"The trees will make everyone smile," she said. "The festival gives a wonderful sense of the Christmas season."

Duke challenges Bush for GOP nod

Former KKK leader ridicules Japanese-Americans, Democrats, Cuomo

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke pledged Wednesday to wage an upstart right-wing presidential challenge to President Bush in "every nook and cranny in the nation."

"I am not a racist," the one-time Nazi sympathizer asserted as he announced his candidacy for the 1992 Republican nomination barely three weeks after losing the Louisiana governor's race in a landslide.

But in the course of a 45-minute news conference, Duke ridiculed what he called the "broken English" of Japanese-Americans, grossly mispronounced the last name of New York Gov. Mario Cuomo and referred to the Democratic Party as the "party of Jesse Jackson and Ron Brown."

Jackson sought the Democratic nomination in 1984 and 1988, and Brown is the current chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Both men are black.

Duke, 41, said Bush had "sold out the Republican Party" on civil rights and in promoting immigration policies that he claimed were undermining a U.S. society he called essentially "Christian ... and of European descent."

"We must begin to protect the integrity of our borders," he said.

The White House and establishment Republican officials derided Duke's candidacy, just as they had done in the Louisiana governor's race and in his unsuccessful 1990 Senate bid.

"He represents the worst in American politics. He stands for bigotry (and) racism," White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said.

"He's not a Republican; he's a charlatan," said B.J. Cooper, spokesman for the Republican National Committee. "He will never, ever, anytime, anywhere, receive any assistance, support, anything from us."

Duke, who briefly ran as a Democratic presidential hopeful in 1988, said he was running as a Republican this time "because that's the only game in town."

"Most Republicans agree with the things I stand for," he asserted at a news conference that was interrupted several times by demonstrators.

A woman who screamed "Nazi, you're a goddamn Nazi" was escorted from the room, as was a man who jumped on the platform waving a sign that said: "David Duke — Nazi of the '90s."

The man with the sign later identified himself as Rabbi Avi Weiss of the Hebrew Institute in Riverdale, N.Y., and president of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns.

"I felt it was necessary for people to see his face next to the sign," Weiss told reporters. "He's dangerous because he's a Nazi and he's very, very slick."

Several dozen demonstrators chanting anti-Duke slogans marched outside the entrance to the National Press Building, where Duke had his news conference.

Duke, who has undergone plastic surgery and what he claims is a transformation of some of his radical views, said he had a simple way of dealing with the huge U.S. trade deficit with Japan.

"We must go to the Japanese and say, 'You no buy our rice; we no buy your cars,'" he said in a singsong voice.

Asked why he chose to use such a derogatory method of phrasing his statement, Duke said he meant no offense but was trying to explain it in a way that people with "broken English" might use.

He vowed to try to enter every primary in the country, but said he could not get geared up in time to qualify for the early New Hampshire race.

"We'll take our campaign to every nook and cranny in the nation," he said.

Duke said he was running to win, but some aides suggested his primary goal was to be a factor at the GOP convention next August.

Duke said he was not ruling out running as a third-party candidate. And he said at some point he might throw his support to conservative columnist Patrick Buchanan, who also is expected to enter the GOP race.

Political analysts suggested Duke might have a hard time qualifying for the ballot in many primaries because of tough criteria.

And Bush campaign officials said while they did not consider Duke a serious threat, he could not be ignored.

"He's certainly no threat to the president's ability to win the nomination," said Charlie Black, a GOP consultant expected to play a key role and Beaver said the accident needs to be reported to the police.

"We like the public to contact us if a deer is hit," Crosby said. "We will usually go out and check to make sure the animal is not suffering."

In the event the animal is dead, one of two things happen. If the animal is not salvageable, the Department of Wildlife and Parks will pick up the animal to be disposed of. If the animal is salvageable, the deer may be claimed for its meat.

"The driver has the first option of keeping the deer for meat or for pelt," Crosby said. "If the driver doesn't want it we refer to the deer-kill list."

The deer-kill list lists people who have left their name and phone number with the police to be contacted in the event of unwanted meat. It is a list open to anyone wanting deer meat.

in Bush's re-election campaign. "But because this guy has such a sordid background, we'll keep speaking out against him."

In the Louisiana contest, Duke got just 39 percent of the vote but won a majority of white votes with an anti-welfare, anti-affirmative action message that critics said was thinly veiled racism.

Duke mispronounced Cuomo's name, pronouncing the beginning like the letter "Q." But he later said he meant no offense to Cuomo's Italian heritage.

And he also denied that his reference to Jesse Jackson and Ron Brown was racially motivated.

After the chaotic news conference, Duke's taxicab got stuck in a traffic jam caused by Bush's motorcade as the president left a nearby hotel following a speech.

Duke and an aide got out of their cab to watch as the president's limousine drove by.

Hostage

kidnappers were, he rolled his eyes and said simply: "Goodbye."

Anderson was to leave later in the evening for Wiesbaden, Germany, where recently released hostages Joseph Cicippio and Alann Steen are resting and undergoing medical examinations. Anderson was accompanied by Larry E. Heinzerling, deputy director of the AP's World Services division.

A U.S. military doctor in Wiesbaden said Steen suffered brain damage and periodic seizures because he was kicked in the head during his captivity.

The release of the three Americans ended the agonizing hostage drama for the United States. Two Germans still are held in Lebanon, however, and U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar said his work would not be over until they are released.

Perez de Cuellar has led delicate negotiations involving a complex swap of Western hostages, hundreds of Arabs held by Israel and information about missing Israeli servicemen.

"I am very pleased," he said. "The American chapter has been closed, but I have other chapters still to close."

Anderson was the best known of the captives and came to personify the hostage ordeal.

President Bush called Anderson in Damascus "to express the love and admiration that all Americans have for Terry," White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said.

Frank Reed, who spent two years in captivity with Anderson, said from Malden, Mass., that Anderson's release truly freed all hostages once held in Lebanon.

"For me, today is the first day you can officially call me an ex-hostage, now that Terry's free," Reed said. "Thank God almighty, we're all free at last."

A flurry of contradictory reports early in the day about Anderson's whereabouts mirrored the agonizing cycle of raised and dashed hopes for release from his 2,455-day ordeal.

Until Anderson arrived in Damascus, it was a painful day for his relatives and friends.

"It's been like a big roller coaster ride," Anderson's 36-year-old brother John said from his home in Ocala, Fla. "But that's the way it's been for almost seven years."

The confusion arose after a five-page Arabic-language statement from the Islamic Jihad group, which held Anderson, announced that he would be set free. But the wording was unclear as to whether he had already been released.

Anderson said in a videotaped statement released Wednesday by his captors to the AP in Damascus that he was to be freed.

"After finishing several stages we decided to separate the issue of our captives from the hostages in the prisons of the enemy and we're going to free our last captive, Terry Anderson, thus folding this page in the hostage file before glorious Christmas," the statement said.

More than 100 Westerners were seized as part of a Shiite Muslim campaign to drive Western influence from Lebanon.

The Islamic Jihad said in its statement the "confrontation" created by the kidnappings made the world listen to the voice of oppressed peoples and unmasked the "ugly American and Israeli faces."

Anderson's relatives were thrilled by the early reports of his release.

Hall residents may have meal-plan options next year; faces Board of Regents vote

Saving students money, giving choices, goals of plan

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

K-State students living in residence halls may have two meal-plan options next year.

The new plan for K-State residence halls has been placed on the Kansas Board of Regents' agenda and will be voted on this month.

Hall residents currently have only one plan: a 20-meal-a-week program that, with room and board, costs $1,420 per year.

The additional plan would let students choose between a 20-meal-a-week plan and the new 15-meal-a-week plan. The new plan would cost $1,380, therefore saving the student $40.

"We made up this plan because most students only eat from 13 to 15 meals a week," said John Pence, associate director of housing and dining services. "We are a break-even organization, and our research tells us to budget for each student only eating about 14 meals a week. So the student who eats 20 is getting a real bargain."

The current plan includes meals served three times a day every day, with the exception of Sunday, when only two meals are served.

The new plan would include meals served three times a day Monday through Friday.

"I think most universities have several different plans to choose from. This should benefit those students who frequently miss meals," said Bob Burgess, assistant director of housing and dining services.

The idea came up because some students had expressed some interest about a new plan, Pence said.

"There will probably be even more plans to choose from in the future," he said. "I think the plan will most likely be approved by the Board of Regents."

If the plan is approved, it will not go into effect until August 1992.

Arab appeal for new date to talk denied

Israel boycotts meetings, plans to negotiate Monday

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration spurned Thursday an Arab appeal that set a new date for negotiations with Israel but tried to arrange informal talks between the two sides as early as Friday.

The Arabs jointly requested a new starting time as a way of avoiding an appearance of giving in to Israel, which boycotted the talks this week and notified the State Department it would send negotiators here to talk on Monday.

"That would fall into the category of issuing a new proposal and that is something we are not going to do," State Department spokeswoman Margaret Tutwiler said of the request the Arab delegations made publicly and privately.

Behind the scenes, meanwhile, Assistant Secretary of State Edward Djerejian took up an Israeli request for informal meetings with the Arabs and got tentative approval from the Palestinians, diplomatic sources said.

The talks would be devoted to procedural matters and held outside the State Department, said the sources, who declined to be identified.

But Syria's chief negotiator, Muwaffak Allaf, questioned the need for the informal talks suggested by the Israelis: "Why do we need such talks? We came here to resume bilateral talks. Israel has tried to delay the discussion of substantive matters."

An early start, even if it focuses only on procedural problems, could provide momentum for the negotiations Israel is ready to hold on Monday.

The Palestinians said the Arab delegations are united in objecting to meeting on Monday, the fourth anniversary of Palestinian rebellion against Israel's control of occupied territories. But both sides have indicated they would accept a later starting date for formal talks.

Syrians, Lebanese, Palestinians and Jordanians all called at the department to discuss the lagging peace talks with Djerejian.

"We are waiting for the co-sponsors to set a new date for the talks. That is why we are here," Mohamed Zakariya

Smith's accuser says he raped her

Smith says he waits for his chance to defend himself

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — In three hours of testimony, William Kennedy Smith's accuser told a jury Wednesday he raped her on the lawn of his family's estate.

She said she screamed and tried to fight him off, but he slammed his body on top of hers and said, "Stop it, bitch!"

"He had me on the ground, and I was trying to get out from under him because he was crushing me," she said.

"I was yelling 'no' and 'stop,' and I tried to get my arm out to get him off of me and he slammed it to the ground," she said. "And he pushed my dress up and he raped me, and I thought he was going to kill me."

The 30-year-old woman's court appearance was the first time she had faced Smith since the fateful Easter weekend.

As Sen. Edward Kennedy's nephew left the courthouse after the woman's

The sensuality of the prairie affects the people who live around it, said Terry Hoyt Evans in her slide-illustrated lecture, "Prairie Traces," Thursday in Union 212.

Evans, an acclaimed photographer, was described by Richard Hansen, assistant professor of landscape architecture, as a citizen artist. She said she wants to be a contributing member of her community.

"I want people to say they had never really seen something until I showed them," Evans said.

Evans said she saw the Konza Prairie as a feminine form full of sensuous shapes.

"The bottom line reason I photograph the prairie is that I love the beauty of it," Evans said.

Evans said she first started out photographing grass. She would shoot the pictures at only four feet away. She said she could look for hours at one plot of land and see many different patterns emerging. For example, Evans said she saw a galaxy surrounded by stars when she looked at a picture of sage coming through winter grass.

Evans spent one year photographing only grasses, and then, she said, she began to realize that the sky was part of the prairie. She said she wanted the viewer to be part of the whole picture.

"In landscape photography you are capturing just a moment in time," said Evans.

Prairie fires began to hold a great interest for Evans. She said she was enthralled with it and the element of the unknown. That, along with the fact that man had to be sensitive to what the fire is doing.

The next phase Evan's work went to was aerial photography. From the air she said she could respect agriculture's place in landscape photography. She said she most liked photographing places where the natural prairie meets agriculture. It was at this time she began shooting the practice bombing sites the military uses.

English GTAs put off strike

Dean Nicholls promises to solve class size problem, Henry says

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

English graduate teaching assistants are no longer threatening to strike, but they still want to make changes in the department and help improve conditions for GTAs throughout the University.

They have also decided not to withhold students' grades to retaliate against the University for its delay in providing them requested public information, said Frank Douglas, president of the Student Association of Graduates in English.

GTAs had considered striking because they are overwhelmed trying to simultaneously teach English composition courses and finish their own degrees, Douglas said.

Jeff Henry, graduate student in English, said the strike did not happen because the GTAs' short-term request was fulfilled.

"We decided not to strike now because our immediate concern this semester was class size," Henry said, "and Dean Nicholls promised us it would be capped at 22."

Peter Nicholls, dean of arts and sciences, implemented the cap for next semester after Douglas went to him explaining the difficulties of having extra students added to composition classes.

This semester, about four students were added to composition classes. But Douglas said that equals about 40-50 extra papers to grade for a teacher who assigns 10-12 per semester.

Henry said, "Our goals weren't to strike or withhold grades, but to improve our lot."

The proposal to withhold students' grades stemmed from a request by SAGE's Committee on Equity to get a list of all GTAs in the University and their salaries. Henry, the committee's chairman, said the group wanted positive and negative feedback about GTAs' working conditions, duties and value to their departments.

There is also a survey question about their interest in forming an all-University GTA organization and possible unionization in the future.

Initially, Douglas said, the committee asked for names only, but then decided to get salaries as well because under the Kansas Open Records Act, state employees' salary information is public, and that information was part of their survey.

However, committee members "got the runaround" trying to obtain the information, he said. They went first to the Graduate School, who told them to go to the registrar, who sent them to payroll. The payroll office said it would take two weeks to get the list. Next they approached the provost, and finally, planning.

"Why we had to go to all that trouble to get a piece of public information, I don't know," Douglas said.

Henry said pursuing the list was frustrating because of contradictions about whether it was being prepared and processed.

The Friday before Thanksgiving, the committee decided to withhold grades for two weeks past their due date if the list did not come within a week, because it felt the University's middle administration was being uncooperative.

Students would not have been hurt by this action, he said, because teachers promised to have their grades ready for them before school was out along with an explanatory letter for their parents, who may wonder why the final report card did not have a grade in English composition.

Rather, the University would have to deal with the phone calls from parents and do a second mailing of report cards when the instructors finally turned in the grades.

"We could've thrown the entire system into some panic," Douglas said.

"It's a simple way of stating, 'You're not the only ones who could be uncooperative.'"

Henry said it would also have been an attention-getting strategy.

"It was a show of support amongst ourselves and SAGE," he said.

But the surveys were finally distributed Tuesday, and Henry said about 60 per day have been coming back. Respondents were asked to turn them in by Dec. 6, but the committee will wait until the beginning of next semester to go through them, because people are too busy to look at them now.

Family, friends ecstatic to see Anderson free

Emotions high for people close to released hostage

By the Associated Press

Terry Anderson's family sounded a joyous outburst Wednesday from suburban New York to the Sierra Nevada foothills and the lakelands of western Kentucky when it became clear that the last American hostage in Lebanon had been freed.

An early-morning blur of unrestrained jubilation gave way to a day fraught with anxiety, a final roller-coaster ride between elation and exasperation before the journalist's whereabouts finally became known.

"Oh God, Terry, you're all right. Great!" exclaimed a cousin, Rusty Ruth, of Grass Valley, Calif., as she watched Anderson chat with reporters on television in Damascus, the Syrian capital.

"I can't believe it — it's true, it's true," echoed her daughter, Robyn.

"He looks pale, he looks lighter, but more importantly he looks like a free man. This feels sweet," said Tom Anderson, tears running down his face. Pictures of his cousin nestled among the Christmas decorations around his home in Valley Stream, N.Y.

In Batavia, N.Y., where Anderson grew up, churches pealed their bells in unison Wednesday night and residents gathered for a thanksgiving service and a party.

In his birthplace of Lorain, Ohio, a crowd of about 150 people cheered as Anderson's relatives, Leila Arden, Eileen Perusek and Edward Jones, tore down a yellow ribbon that had adorned the City Hall flagpole since he was taken hostage.

Anderson, 44, the chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, was kidnapped March 16, 1985. He was the longest held of 16 Americans taken captive since March 1984 and, after 2,455 days, the last to be let go. Three of those Americans were slain by their captors.

Smiling broadly and looking healthy, he appeared publicly for the first time.

"You can't imagine how glad I am to see you," an emotional Anderson told fellow reporters.

His release was first reported by Iran's state-run news agency around 3 a.m. EST, but conflicting reports abounded before he was turned over more than 11 hours later to the U.S. ambassador in Syria.

Until that time, the strain had mounted.

"We're sitting tight, waiting and hoping. To me, it's like another form of terrorism, the teasing," said Eileen Motter, a cousin from Marietta, Ga.

"Isn't that exasperating? These guys are playing out the string to the last excruciating moment?" said Jack Shelly, a retired professor of broadcast journalism at Iowa State University, who was Anderson's academic adviser.

Peggy Say, one of Anderson's four siblings, awaited their reunion at the U.S. military hospital in Wiesbaden, Germany, where freed U.S. hostages are routinely taken. She has traveled

Arraignment in Heintze case Dec. 11

JUNCTION CITY (AP) — One of two soldiers charged in the death of a convenience store clerk waived a preliminary hearing and was bound over for trial in Geary County District Court.

Nathaniel Ellibee, 19, of Sandpoint, Idaho, waived the hearing Thursday during an appearance before Magistrate Judge Larry Hylton of Council Grove. The judge scheduled arraignment for Dec. 11.

Ellibee and another soldier stationed at Fort Riley, Jason Turner, 21, of Reedsport, Ore., are charged in the Sept. 10 shooting of Catherine Heintze, 20, of rural Milford.

Heintze, a K-State student, was shot to death while working at Pate's Convenience Corner north of Junction City.

Ellibee is charged with aiding and abetting felony murder, aiding attempted aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery.

Turner, whose preliminary hearing is scheduled Dec. 13, is charged with felony murder, attempted aggravated robbery, conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery and aggravated kidnapping.

The latter charge was added in an amended complaint filed earlier this week by Chris Biggs, the Geary County attorney. The prosecutor said it was based on additional information from the sheriff's department and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

Trial date set for Fort Riley man

JUNCTION CITY (AP) — A 22-year-old man was bound over for trial on a second-degree murder charge Thursday in the fatal shooting of another Fort Riley enlisted man at a tavern.

Magistrate Judge Larry Hylton ordered the trial for Marvin Guydon after about three hours of testimony at a preliminary hearing. Arraignment was set for December 10 for Guydon, whose rank and hometown weren't available.

Geary County authorities sought a first-degree murder charge in the Nov. 15 killing of Pfc. Richard Tapscott Jr., 22, of Decatur, Ala.

Tapscott died of an apparent gunshot wound to the chest.

Several witnesses testified Guydon had been threatened by the victim, who allegedly put a gun to his head twice before they exchanged gunfire.

Escapee believed to be in KC area

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A convicted rapist who escaped from prison earlier this week is believed responsible for the abduction and rape of a Kansas City woman, the FBI said Thursday.

Larnell L. Dykes, 24, escaped from the Lansing Correctional Facility on Tuesday, apparently in a trash compactor, and was believed seen later that day by a landfill worker in Shawnee, officials said.

Wednesday afternoon, a man entered a Kansas City business and asked the woman for a job. When he was told none was available, he brandished a small handgun, FBI special agent Jeff Lanza said.

The man then abducted the 25-year-old woman, drove to her bank in her car and made her withdraw $525, Lanza said. He then took her to East St. Louis, Ill., and around 7:30 p.m., stopped the car under a viaduct, where he raped her, he said.

The suspect drove the victim to St. Mary's Hospital in East St. Louis, gave her $40 and left her, Lanza said.

"We have probable cause to believe that he is the one," the special agent said, adding that the FBI was seeking a warrant for Dykes' arrest on a kidnapping charge.

Authorities in East St. Louis found the victim's car about 3:45 a.m. Thursday, he said. Prison-issued boots and a jacket were found in a nearby dumpster.

Lanza said the victim's description of her abductor matched Dykes' and that she told authorities the suspect said he was a recent prison escapee convicted of kidnapping and murder.

Dykes, of Wichita, is serving a term of life plus 30 years for the 1989 abduction and rape of a 19-year-old woman from the Wichita State University campus.

Nola Foulston, Sedgwick County district attorney, said Thursday following Dykes' escape that she requested and received police protection for the woman Dykes was convicted of abducting and raping.

"There is absolutely no question, based on the situation here in Sedgwick County, this is an extremely dangerous individual," Foulston said.

Dykes was discovered missing during a head count Tuesday morning. Lansing officials at the time believed he was still inside the facility.

Lost, found department successful

Most items kept in Union basement; others turned in to campus police

JULIE LONG
Collegian Reporter

Lost umbrellas, calculators, glasses, keys, hats and even a doll can be found in the K-State Union's lost and found department, located in the building's basement.

Cissie Cooper, information counter supervisor, said all kinds of things get turned in.

"Anything you can possibly lose, we get," Cooper said.

The majority of the items turned in are things found in the building, but some are items found on campus. Cooper said maintenance and food service workers also turn in items.

A log book is kept of all the items. After the lost and found is closed, the log is kept at the information counter.

To recover an item, an individual should give a description of the item and look through the log book to see if it was returned.

Cooper said most items are kept at least a semester and a half.

"It varies, depending on what it is," Cooper said.

Most of the items are kept in the lost and found room in the basement, Cooper said, but anything of real value goes to the business office to be put in the safe.

After a year, some items are donated to places where they can be used. One year, the books were given to Farrell Library, and the clothing went to the Salvation Army in Junction City.

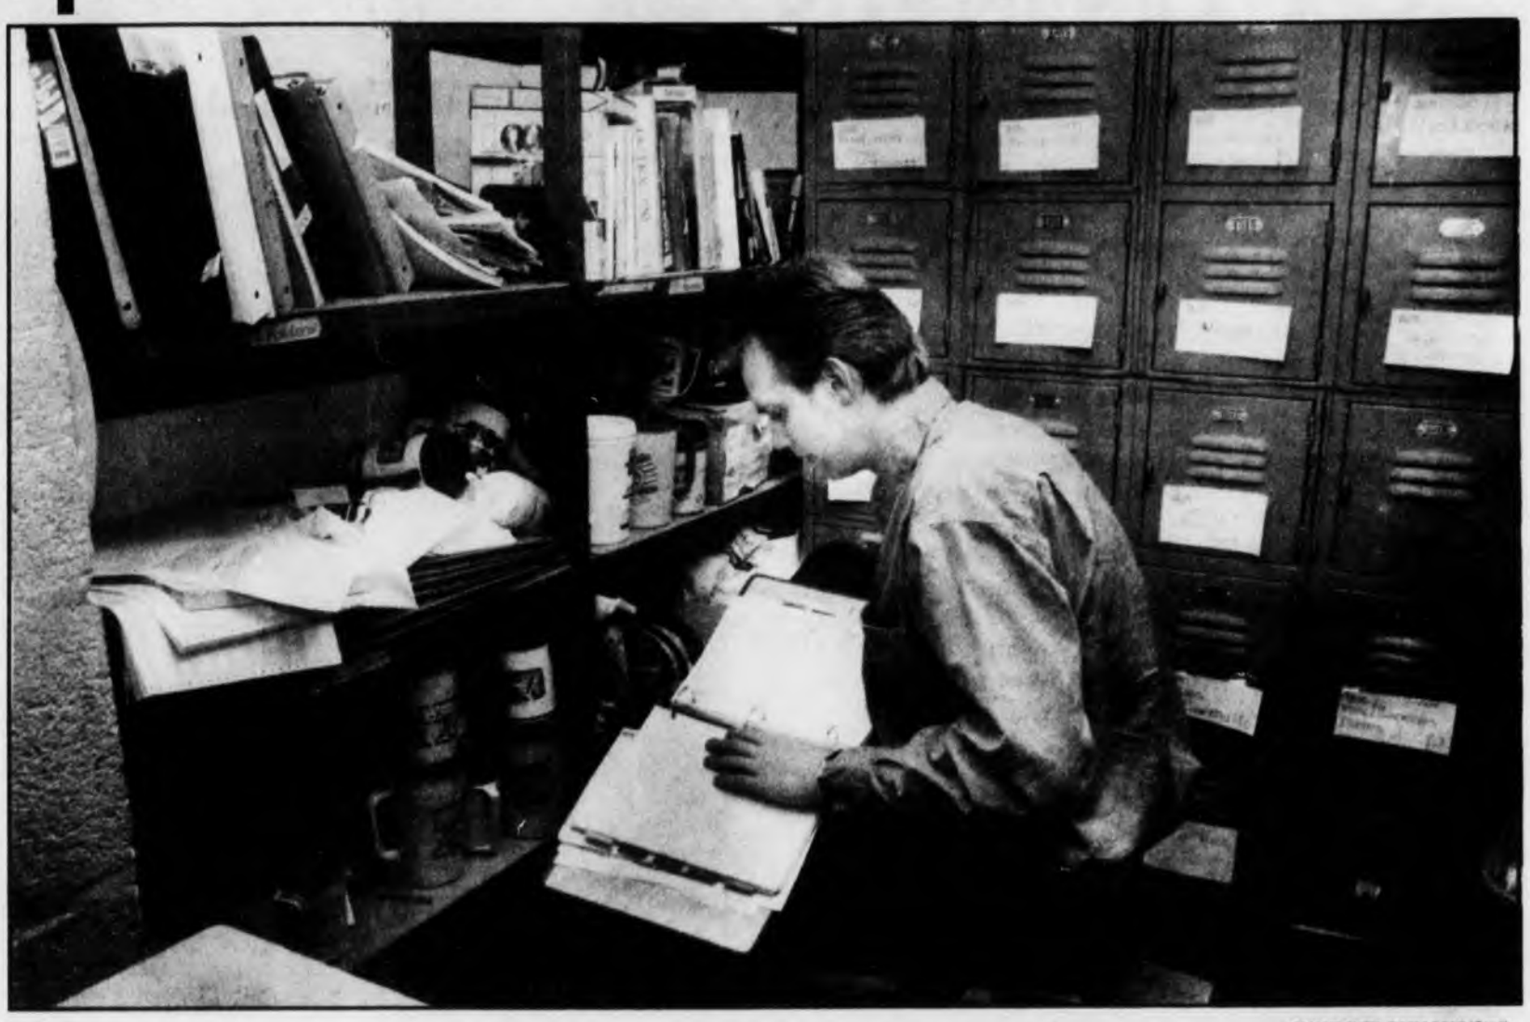
Cooper said although the lost and found department requires extra effort, it is successful.



"It serves its function fairly well," Cooper said.

Lost items are also often turned in to the K-State Police Department — everything from class rings to tires and even cement blocks.

Campus police Lt. Robert Mellgren said the majority of items officers pick up are bicycles. They are often illegally parked or illegally secured.

Mellgren said items received by the campus police are kept from six months to a year.

Mellgren said people often do not know their serial numbers. It would be helpful if they recorded their serial numbers or wrote their social security number on the item, he said.

MIKE WELCHHANS/Staff

Items lost in the K-State Union can sometimes be found in the lost and found office on the lower level. Erik Rogers, freshman in environmental design, looks up the number for a lost item. Anything from textbooks, class notes, articles of clothing and backpacks are turned in.

Businesses forced to recycle

Rising cost in trash disposal pickup, landfill problem, aid recycling programs

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Awareness of the environment and rising costs of trash pickup have given some area businesses the incentive to begin recycling programs.

"The cost of throwing it away is costing more than recycling and helping the environment," said Dean Taylor, owner of the Palace.

The Palace began recycling two years ago following an increased cost in trash disposal pickup, Taylor said. The increase in cost was caused by a higher fee from the landfill.

"It used to be I could take a pickup load of trash out there for a dollar," Taylor said. "Now it costs $9."

ENVIRONMENT

The Palace ended trash pickup and began finding alternative ways to reduce its waste. Besides recycling cardboard, plastic and glass, Taylor said he also takes foam packing peanuts to the Mail Center.

Vista Drive-In Restaurant is another business that has taken measures to reduce waste. The restaurant chain serves food in reusable plastic baskets and encourages customers to buy and use plastic refillable glasses to lessen the number of plastic foam cups used.

Vista owner Karen Streeter said the restaurant also recycles plastic food containers and cardboard and shreds office paper to be used as packaging and bedding.

Due to heightened awareness and action, Streeter said, Vista has reduced its disposal cost by lessening the number of trash pickups per week from seven to four.

"In one respect, we recycle to help the environment by keeping in mind the ever-filling landfill problem," Streeter said. "In another respect, we do it to help lower our trash pickup cost."

Recycling cuts disposal cost for some businesses, but recycling is costly for some smaller businesses. Cost of labor and lack of a financial incentive are reasons many businesses don't recycle, Streeter said.

Taylor said reduced disposal pickup cost and the environment aren't enough incentive for some smaller businesses to recycle.

Tax not answer to K-State problems

The Manhattan City Commission shot down an effort to gain legislative approval to raise sales tax by a half cent earlier this week, and we're glad they did it.

The profits from the sales tax would have been, in theory, given to K-State. This sales tax would have raised about $2 million in revenue for the University in about a year.

Now, that would have been a fine shot in the arm to K-State in these troubled times. As roofs cave in on offices that never should have been offices on the third floor of Eisenhower Hall and classes close because of a lack of commitment to education that both the administration as well as the state Legislature have shown, two million smackers would've been nice.

We don't think the citizens of Manhattan should have to foot the bill for us. They already have to put up with annoying traffic, a beer pit in the middle of their city and a crowded mall. The 5.75-cent sales tax in Manhattan is already too high. Neither citizen nor student could afford a half-cent tax raise. So, to borrow from King George, read our lips: No new taxes.

What we would really like from the citizens of Manhattan is careful consideration the next time they go to the voting booths. We ask Manhattanites to oust any politician who has not voted sensibly on spending and education issues in the past few years. We ask K-State's host city to support those people who will commit themselves to the children and young people of the state.

That is the only way we, as students and citizens, won't have to deal with this again and the only way the problem will be solved permanently.

Finney

Changing prison terms not trivial subject

Come to Kansas to commit a murder. You can't get the death penalty, and if you're lucky, you can get the governor to shorten your life sentence.

Gov. Joan Finney has done just that. She shortened the life sentence of Brenda Lemon, who was convicted of killing her husband in 1983. With Finney's help, Lemon's sentence was reduced to 10 to 20 years in prison, and she will be eligible for parole.

Finney's spokeswoman said it was because of Lemon's good prison and work records, and because she has a child. With those requirements, probably half of the prisoners in Kansas institutions could get Finney to shorten their sentences, too. A good prison record and a child just aren't that unusual of circumstances.

True, this is only the second of 70 such requests that Finney has granted, and Kansas law gives her that right as governor. But that law also says the governor can reduce a sentence only after the judges and prosecutors involved are informed.

Finney didn't handle her burden of notification responsibly. Geary County Attorney Chris Briggs said he was never notified, and that if he had been, he would have objected strongly. Notification was supposedly sent, but no one really knows because Finney's office didn't think it important enough to use certified mail.

Commuting life sentences is too important to neglect going through the proper channels and ensure notification of all those involved. Finney may not have to work with the legislators, but she does have to work with our court system.

The end of the BAND as we know it

Marching band deserves help with financial problems

It was, quite literally, the day the music died.

After years of financial bickering amongst the powers-that-be and lack of general support from the various student organizations, the KSU Marching Band played one last, long farewell song and departed into the mists of oblivion.

By no means was it a quick death. For years, the band had been forced to operate on a razor-thin budget, one that if tripled in size, would still be the smallest of all Big Eight marching organizations.

And by no means was it just the thanatos of another student activity. It was an empty conclusion for every person who had played for or been associated with the band — students who devoted an average of 235 hours of practice and performance per season, volunteers who worked for little or no pay simply out of the devotion they had to the band.

Yes, it certainly was the students who suffered the most. Students who put in 12-16 hours of toil per game day. People who studied full time, had other jobs, family obligations, the social and financial stresses we all feel every day.

The same individuals served as ambassadors of the University by playing the halftime show at the Kansas City Chiefs-Buffalo Bills game on Monday Night Football. Students who raised more than $11,000 on their own to travel to the Iowa State football game in 1991. Students who played for a number of high schools around the state.

All of this for one credit hour and little or no appreciation.

One may ask how this atrocity was allowed to happen to an organization that had been a permanent fixture for so long. To understand this, one must first look at the fact that in order realize its full potential, the band needed a budget of $75,000 instead of the $21,500 given to them, all through the athletic department. Financing for any activity the band chose to do, outside of its paltry budget, had to come from the members' pockets (such as the Iowa State game).

Perhaps another factor was that the band could not offer any scholarships to its members, while it was common knowledge that just down the river, the University of Kansas had all of its marchers on scholarship, operating with a budget about five times bigger than K-State's.

Accentuating this disparity in available money was the fact that after K-State's budget, the rest of the Big

JARED GREGOIRE

Eight budgets ranged from $65,000 to $125,000. These schools had the distinct advantage of having support from school activities, university foundations, donor programs and the all-important student senate.

The band received exactly nothing from its Student Senate or general student body. And the ironic thing was that the band's level of support from its athletic department was comparable to all other Big Eight universities. In fact, the band could not afford to pay the $1000 yearly due to be a member of the Big Eight Band Masters Association, consequently being the only school not in the association. We had to give credit to Mizzou, who paid the band's fee for the first two years of its existence.

It was unfortunate that these shortcomings had to be rubbed in by the fact that each student was made to pay the $10 cleaning fee for his or her uniform, and the fact that the students who took time out of their classes to travel and recruit at high schools received no compensation for their efforts.

Unfortunately, the scenario just given is all too true — except that the band still marches on, despite its lack of support and anorexic budget, simply through the perseverance of its members and support staff.

But unless organizations such as Student Senate or the alumni organizations begin to financially aid the band, as is their obligation, the final song of "Taps" will be the only reminder of a group of people who above all deserved, but never received, their due.

'Happy holidays' can be meaningless expression

Season not jolly for less-fortunate

JEONG-HEE KIM GUEST

Jeong-Hee Kim is a graduate student in adult and continuing education.

The other day, I found a stanza of a poem, "Resume," written by Dorothy Parker while I was reading a book.

Razors pain you;
Rives are damp;
Acids stain you;
and drugs cause cramp.
Guns aren't lawful;
Nooses give;
Gas smells awful;
You might as well live.

As I was glancing at this poem, I remembered my friend Peter's death. And other young students' tragic accidents intertwined with my stress and pressure of finishing the semester with satisfaction. The monster named stress gets bigger and bigger and wants to chew me up. I try to maintain a good feelings by reminding myself, "Well, I'll be cool. Survival kits will help, and it will be over soon. Then, I will have a peaceful and wonderful Christmas."

To most people, from Thanksgiving weekend to Christmas is the happiest season of the year. It seems to me that Americans start to decorate houses and buy gifts for Christmas as soon as they are cleaning up their dishes from Thanksgiving dinner. Trees and streets are decorated with bright lights. Shopping malls are filled with Christmas shoppers. I am excited to think about the spirit of the holiday season and caroling with friends. Snow and Santa's treats will increase my jolly mood. Tons of donated food will be delivered to needy people again this year.

Filling meals help people feel good and be happy for a while. But I wonder whether the happiness and merry feelings of the mainstream accelerate the loneliness, hopelessness and feelings of worthlessness of less fortunate people around us.

It is hard to meet lonely and depressed people at the shopping mall or on campus. People's pride, pretense and fear of exposing their depression prevent them from making friends. Some students may excuse themselves by burying themselves in books in a corner of the library. They may seek help from alcohol and drugs, as one of my clients did. They pretend to be cheerful by wearing masks. They seem to hide themselves from classmates, neighbors and professional help. They are crying for help, but not in an appropriate way.

Maybe my friend Peter had a similar feeling during the Christmas season four years ago. I wonder whether that feeling and his pride led him to take his own life. I may be wrong.

He is gone, but he still affects many people. My guilty feelings of ignorance and acute pain diminish little by little as time passes. They will fade away eventually.

I feel sorry for his family who will be ambivalent about the holiday season and the anniversary of his death. I often think about his mother and wonder whether she can find comfort.

It seems awkward to think about people's death, sorrow and loneliness when all students , including me, are trying to concentrate on getting good grades and having a bright future. It seems inappropriate to mention loneliness and depression when the merriest holiday season nears. But as the Collegian mentioned several times, this holiday season may create crises for less fortunate people. There is a danger that these feelings may lead them to make fatal decisions.

Right now, we are occupied with exams and final projects. Let's step back and look around.

A little bit of sensitivity and concern for classmates and neighbors will bring people peace and happiness. By recognizing warning signs in lonely, less fortunate people's behavior, we may make new friends.

As Parker expressed, we should choose to live our lives instead of giving up. When we challenge difficulties we find our lives meaningful. Professional help shortens people's confusion and suffering. Let us find our pathway to a good life. Let's try.

Students bring Oz journal to life

Publication pushes the edge of architecture, competes with faculty work

DARLA GOODMAN
Staff Writer

Oz is not just a fictional land in a Hollywood movie. It really is in Kansas.

In fact, it's on the K-State campus in Seaton Hall.

Oz is the journal of the College of Architecture and Design at K-State.

It is one of a small group of architectural journals published in the United States, but it is unique even among that group.

The journal is entirely operated by students. Other publications, from schools such as Yale, Harvard, Princeton and the University of Virginia, are prepared by faculty, academics and professionals.

"Its purpose is to have some sort of critical look at what architecture is these days," said Ray Streeter, assistant professor of architecture and Oz adviser. "Others don't usually put in student work. We make an effort to put student work in along with professional and academic work."

This year's edition marks the 14th consecutive year of the publication, which will have 72 pages. Streeter said this is a feat, because it takes a lot of dedication and work to put a journal out every year. Most other journals have not been around that long.

The three-student editorial team handles all aspects of the production, content and design of the journal, including all fund raising. The staff must raise the entire cost of the journal, because it is not funded by the college.

Co-editor Sarah Baird, senior in architecture, said the staff has been selling journals at tables and writing letters to alumni and architectural firms who donate money to the project and purchase the journal.

The staff of about 20 people comes from all departments in the College of Architecture.

"It's a total student-run journal. We develop the theme. We raise the money," said co-editor Mike Linenbroker, senior in architecture. "We sell it, and we market it."

Production is a time-consuming process, Streeter said.

"For the editors, it's a full-time job," he said. "It's basically like another design studio."

The editors agreed. Linenbroker and Ben Stindt, senior in architecture, are roommates as well as studio partners and co-editors. They said they spend so much time in the Oz office that most people call them there if they're not at home.

It can be difficult to balance work in the office with work for studio. They said they have to keep their priorities straight, and their instructors help them with that.

"It just comes down to time management," Linenbroker said.

The editors receive no pay for their work, but will get three hours of credit next semester.

Linenbroker said in some ways, it is good they don't get paid. If they were paid by the college, then faculty members could influence what goes in the journal. This way, he said, they are independent.

But the time spent is not without rewards.

"I've learned in the past semester more than some students will in two years," Stindt said. "I'm going to have a direction for the kind of architecture I want to do.

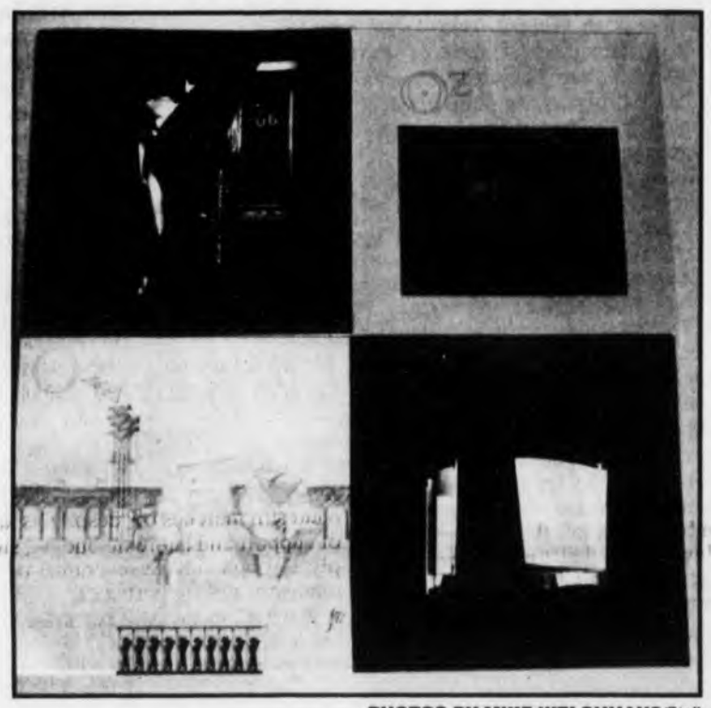
"As rigorous as the program is, you're just doing things to do them. This is something we're doing because we want to.

"I think all three of us value what we're doing. I think that's evident at 4:30 a.m. when the three of us are in here inspired and not complaining too much. I can't think of any better preparation for our real life experience of working in an architectural firm," he said.

All three of the editors studied in Italy last spring and were asked to work on the journal while they were there.

Linenbroker and Baird said they didn't know much about it, but they were impressed when an instructor showed them a copy.

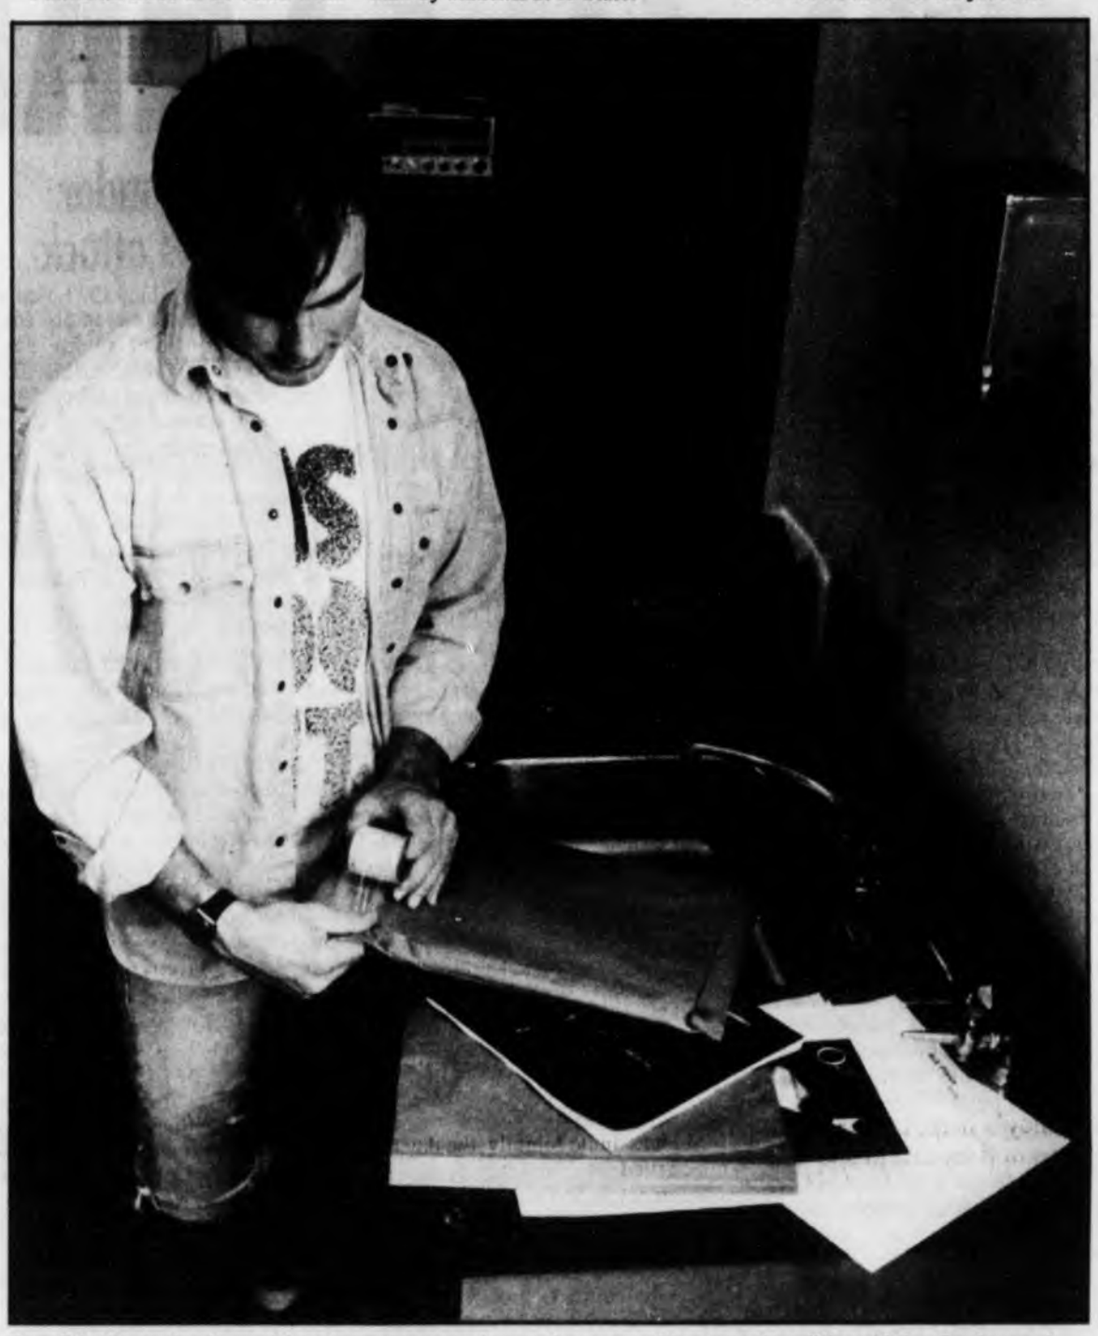
Stindt, who had done some work for the publication during his third year, said it was probably better known among professional architects than by students at K-State.



The journal contains pieces written by professionals in the architectural world that are studied in class.

Stindt said he came into the office last week while Linenbroker was talking on the phone to Lebbeus Woods, a cutting-edge architect who will be writing for this year's journal.

"At least for me, these people are not really people," Linenbroker said. "It puts them in perspective."



Stindt said many professionals are impressed that Oz is an undergraduate publication. They say the themes reflect the newest developments in the field.

Writers for the journal are solicited from all over the world. Some of the most respected names in the field have contributed to the journal.

The Oz Journal, currently in its 14th edition, is managed by architecture students who are working on the latest edition.

Ben Stindt, senior in architecture, prepares to send a copy of last year's edition of the Oz Journal to a contributing writer. Entries in the prestigious journal come from architects all over the world.

Genetic disease common in large dogs

STEPHANIE WATSON
Collegian Reporter

Pet lovers considering buying dogs these days may want to check into their canine's family history.

When Michelle Horsch, senior in elementary education, bought her boyfriend a black labrador puppy, she had no idea they would have to put it to sleep less than three months later.

Their puppy, Zeke, had been sleeping more than usual and seemed to be in pain when he walked. He also couldn't keep up with the other dogs in the house.

One night after taking Zeke for a walk, Horsch told her boyfriend she thought something was seriously wrong with him and that maybe they should take him into the veterinarian.

The next day they took Zeke to the Veterinary Medicine Complex where he was diagnosed as having severe hip dysplasia, a common skeletal developmental defect prone to large breeds of dogs.

They were given the options of paying $1,200 for corrective surgery or putting their dog to sleep. With a college budget, they both knew what they'd have to do, and one week later they took him back in for the last time.

Dr. Ron McClaughlin, assistant professor of small animal surgery, said hip dysplasia is a very complicated disease that has been around for a long time.

"Every day I see a dog with this disease," he said.

McClaughlin said hip dysplasia is most common in large dogs such as German shepherds, St. Bernards, rottweilers and retrievers.

He added it has been proven genetics and environmental factors are involved with the defect, but there are still many unanswered questions.

He said some of the signs in young dogs are decreased activity, reluctance to climb stairs, gait abnormalities and hip pain.

McClaughlin said today's breeders should be able to show potential puppy buyers the dog's genetic history to ensure hip dysplasia will not be a problem in the future.

"People can have a veterinarian send an X-ray of their dog's pelvis to the Orthopedic Foundation for Animals. The OFA can tell if the dog has dysplasia or not, and if so, how severe," he said.

Breeders, he said, should have their dogs OFA certified and should not continue to breed a dog with dysplasia since it is a genetic disorder.

"I wouldn't buy a dog that wasn't OFA certified," he added.

★WAR EXTRA! WAR EXTRA!★

PRELUDE TO PEARL HARBOR

Pearl Harbor wasn't the first, says history

Shadows seen in Russia

It was early in the morning. They hadn't been up long before the first silhouettes could be seen on the sea.

The shadows were those of Japanese ships making final preparations for an attack. Everything was a go for the marauders. The attack commenced, and a deadly blow was dealt by the aggressor.

It was Port Arthur, Russia, 1904.

A new day was dawning over Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, that Sunday. Asleep aboard ships in the harbor and barracks on land were more than 20,000 American Navy, Marine and Army personnel.

The early morning sky was clearing after a typically short-lived tropical shower. There were no planes on reconnaissance, and no significant ship patrolling the island's perimeter, so the vast armada of fighter planes approached unseen.

They came from the northwest, flying through the saw-toothed mountains that surround the harbor. The element of surprise was theirs.

It was February, 1932.

Fortunately, in that attack, the casualties were nil, for it was a mock attack staged by air-minded Navy Adm. Harry Yarnell.

No one listened to Admiral Yarnell

The Harbor's a 'mousetrap'

'Air power' not respected

In the early 1920s, the United States had decided to upgrade the Pearl Harbor refueling depot to a full-fledged naval base.

From the outset, opposition raged. Yarnell, a respected man in the Navy, called the harbor a "mousetrap" and professed any ships in the bay would easily be destroyed in any major air strike.

Despite Yarnell's words, air power had not yet earned the respect of the Armed Forces. Though they took part in World War I, airplanes were nothing more than a sidelight to a fierce ground and sea campaign in the view of high command.

So, when 152 planes left the decks of the carriers Saratoga and Lexington, achieved total surprise and reported there would have been heavy losses, Yarnell's stunt was mostly overlooked by other commanders.

While their American counterparts had barely lost sleep over Yarnell's lesson, Japanese naval attaches in Honolulu read about the exercise and were so impressed by the feat that they filed numerous reports to Tokyo.

Although American intelligence on the island knew of the dispatches, the monumental meaning of the entire incident escaped them. The most outspoken of the disbelievers were the so-called "battleship admirals," naval leaders who believed nothing inasmuch as a puny airplane could inflict damage on such a large and powerful battleship.

They would be the ones who would lose the most.

America, Hawaii long-time friends

The first American military man to set eyes on Pearl Harbor was Commodore Charles Wilkes in 1840, nearly 51 years after the first American vessel, the Columbia Rediviva, visited the islands, and a generation after missionaries converted islanders to Christianity.

After rounding the channel entrance point between Keahi Point and Holokahili Point to what would be known as Pearl Harbor (called Wai Momi, the River of Pearls, by native Polynesians), Wilkes concluded, "If the water upon the bar should be deepened, which no doubt can be effected, it would afford the best and most capacious harbor in the Pacific."

The entrance Wilkes referred to was blocked by a mudflat for most of its 375-yard width during low tide. Once over the bar though, Wilkes discovered the harbor, surrounded by volcanic ridges, was completely sheltered from typhoons, making it ideal as a refueling depot.

Before the end of the decade, President John Tyler extended the Monroe Doctrine to include the islands and dispatched a fleet to Hawaii.

The bar was blasted and the harbor was at last open to major merchant development in the last quarter of the 19th century. In the 1870s, the Hawaiian people overthrew King Kalakaua, reducing his power and granting the United States exclusive rights to the harbor in return for buying Hawaiian goods.

Throughout the rest of the 19th century and the first quarter of the 20th, the use of the harbor expanded and the American-Hawaiian relationship deepened until the Islands were annexed in 1898.

The Naval Coal Depot, increasing its storage capacity from 1,000 to 20,000 tons was redesignated the U.S. Naval Station. The channel was dredged to allow larger ships to enter the harbor, and with the arrival of the USS Petrel, a gunboat, a new era began for the military.

America, Hawaii long-time friends

New Air Fields bring more troops

Post World War I years brought airplanes to Pearl Harbor as the Secretaries of War and Navy agreed on the joint use of Ford Island as an airfield when the USS Chicago and her four seaplanes dropped anchor.

Wheeler Field was established soon afterward in 1922. Several other military installations were built in the surrounding area, including Schofield Barracks.

In the years following Yarnell's mock surprise attack, the Air Corps repeatedly mock-engaged the Harbor area inflicting similar damages and causing just enough doubt in the Navy Department to keep the harbor from becoming the home port of the Pacific Fleet, which at the time was based in San Pedro, Calif.

The result was the creation of Hickam Field, the largest air field ever built at the time by the United States, completed in 1935. Pearl Harbor was becoming everything Commodore Wilkes thought it could be.

Japan enslaves Korea

During Pearl Harbor's growth years, relations between the Japanese Empire and America were worsening.

Throughout Pearl Harbor's growing years, Japan was following what it believed was its manifest destiny: to rule the Asian peoples. In 1904, the Japanese armada struck at Port Arthur, Russia, as a part of a continuing feud over territory that would continue through to World War II's end. In 1910, Korea was annexed by the Empire.

Empire turns to air power

Invades Manchuria

After World War I, Japan was awarded the Marianas, the Marshalls and the Carolines, valuable islands in the the Pacific. Also, a second agreement signed by Japan after the end of World War I placed restrictions on the construction and deployment of large gunboats. As a result, the Empire turned to the lesser-known, lesser-feared aircraft carrier and began perfecting its aviation technology.

With such a reward, Japan set its sights on Manchuria, invading in 1931. Though moderately upset with the Empire, U.S. Presidents Herbert Hoover and Franklin Roosevelt remained concerned with what Japan could use its new islands for in the future. Strategically, Japan's islands were placed well within range of American installations in the Philippines, Guam, Wake, Midway and Hawaii.

Roosevelt took steps to increase the American presence in the region, sending ships and planes to its Pacific installations to the dismay of the Japanese.

Both countries engaged in cat and mouse play in the sea and mock engagements in the air, increasing tensions in both armed forces.

When the USS Panay, a light gunboat, was attacked and sunk in the Yangtze River by two Japanese fighter planes on Dec. 12, 1937, relations ground to a halt.

After a terse diplomatic standoff, the Japanese government apologized for the incident, but the lines were drawn. The apology was not enough to convince American military leaders the attack was as accidental as Japan claimed.

The road to war was being paved.

Harbor hideout fortified

After the Panay incident, millions of dollars were poured into the development and fortification in the Harbor and the island of Oahu in general.

The Hawaiian Air Force of the Army was established. Troop strength reached 25,000 between the Navy and the Army, and thousands more were in the area aboard ships.

By 1940, Gen. George Catlett Marshall, the first Army Chief of Staff to visit, said, "The island of Oahu, due to its fortifications, its garrison and its physical characteristics, is believed to be the strongest fortress in the world,"

Marshall went on to say later that he had "no intimation" that America's command and its operations were not prepared for war.

But there were doubters. Joseph K. Taussig, a World War I hero, said America was no more prepared for war than Poland was and that war with Japan was "inevitable," since the Imperial warlords' long-range plan was that of world conquest "after first crushing the United States."

Roosevelt agreed with Taussig, and in the same year, he ordered the Pacific Fleet to Pearl Harbor from San Pedro, Calif.

Admiral James O. Richardson, commanding officer of the Pacific Fleet, was enraged by Roosevelt's decision, calling the Harbor a "mousetrap" and his fleet "a sitting duck."

By the time of Richardson's comments, events had accelerated. Japan was running rampant in Manchuria, French Indochina and had entered into a direct confrontation with the Soviet Union. Furthermore, for insurance, Tokyo entered the Tri-Partite Pact with Italy and Gennany, a blatant jab at the United States.

Ambassador predicts attack

On New Year's Day 1941, Ambassador Joseph E. Grew, in his Tokyo embassy, confided in his diary: "There's a lot of talk that the Japanese, in case of a break with the United States, are planning to go all out in a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor."

Roosevelt, calling the Japanese the "Prussians of the East," decided in July 1941 he was sick of "babying along" the Japanese, and along with England, he froze all Japanese assets in the United States.

Suddenly, the Imperial command was denied oil, iron ore, manganese, scrap and several other raw materials desperately needed for the war machine.

In early September, Premier Prince Fumimaro Konoye wrote in his diary:

"In view of the present pressing situation, the offensives of the United States, Britain, the Netherlands, etc., toward Japan and the flexibility of the national power of the Empire, the enforcement of the measures regarding the southern regions shall be made as follows:

"1. The Empire shall complete war preparations with the last decade (week) of October as the aim under the determination not to mind war with the United States, Britain and the Netherlands for the purpose of guaranteeing its self-existence and self-defense.

"2. In parallel to it, the Empire shall have recourse to diplomatic means in dealing with the United States and Britain and endeavor to have its demands attained.

"3. In case there is found no way still for attainment of our demands, even in the first decade of October, the Empire shall at once determine upon war with the United States, Britain and the Netherlands."

There was not much air power on Hawaii to offset "war preparations," as it turned out. Of 227 planes at Hickam, Wheeler and Bellows fields, half were classified as obsolete. There were only six operating B-17 bombers.

As strong as Konoye's words sounded, he was labeled a moderate by the Imperial command and was replaced by the tough, single-minded Lt. Gen. Hideki Tojo, known as "Kamisori," or "the razor blade."

U.S. War Department officials winced upon learning of Tojo's appointment and feared an armed conflict truly was inevitable. However, they were also caught off guard when Tojo made a seemingly gracious commitment to a peaceful resolution by rushing a second envoy, Saburo Karusu, to Washington to supplement Ambassador Kichisaburo Nomura and the ongoing peace talks.

Coincidentally, the day before Karusu was called to receive his credentials, members of the Japanese Navy's Special Attack Forces assembled at Kure Naval Base.

Ensign Kazuo Sakamaki, commander of a two-man midget submarine, read this message to those gathered:

"These are the orders from the headquarters of the General Staff of the Imperial Navy. Your are herewith to take positions of readiness for war with the United States of America."

Intelligence performs 'Magic'

Hopes for diplomatic solution fade

By late November, peace talks were at a standstill as both sides bickered over details, then ceased speaking altogether.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who would go on to win the Nobel Peace Prize in 1945 for his efforts to prevent the war, was so worried over the stalemate that he persuaded Roosevelt to come back from his Thanksgiving vacation in Georgia.

The intelligence community already had a bead on Japan's intentions. Jointly, the Army and Navy had invented the "Purple" machine, able to intercept and decode Japanese dispatches. Due to the amazing abilities of the machine, each of the messages it printed out were then dubbed "Magic" messages.

Roosevelt was presented with a stack of Magic messages when he returned from vacation Dec. 1. The bulk of the messages were of dispatches between Tokyo and Japan's embassy, in mysterious phrases which were taken to regard certain military maneuvers in the Pacific.

The implied threat in the messages was enough to prompt Admiral Harold R. Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, to send a warning to Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, successor to Richardson in the Pacific Fleet:

"This dispatch is to be considered a war warning. Negotiations with Japan looking toward stabilization of conditions in Pacific have ceased, and an aggressive move by Japan is expected within the next few days."

A fleet of 70 Japanese ships were detected moving toward Indochina and the Philippines.

Stark wrote another personal note and attached to the message:

"... neither Roosevelt or Hull would be surprised over a Japanese surprise attack. From many angles, an attack on the Philippines would be the most embarrassing thing that could happen to us. ... I do not give it the weight the others do. ... I have generally held that it was not time for the Japanese to proceed against Russia. I still do. Also, I still rather look for an advance into Thailand, Indo-China, Burma Road as the most likely.

"I won't go into the pros and cons of what the United States may do. I will be damned if I know. I wish I did. The only thing I do know is that we may do most anything and that's the only thing I know to be prepared for. ..."

Pearl downplays air threat

10 Imperial aircraft carriers 'vanish'

Stark's friendly intent only augmented the fears of the Pacific command, which had grown to encompass over 42,000 men. Fearing to take any outright steps toward war which would upset Japan, the command opted to go to a sabotage alert, the lowest of various states of preparedness. Another thought was that a sabotage alert would not be outwardly noticed by Hawaiian residents.

The usual preparations made for sabotage alert were, ironically, what was responsible for the extensive damage inflicted during the bombing. Planes were to be grouped on the fields so one or two sentries could effectively guard them. Live ammunition, especially for the large caliber battleship guns and anti-aircraft cannons, was to be locked so few had access without obtaining keys from a duty officer.

As a result, to swing the huge anti-aircraft guns guarding the base to a ready status could take hours since duty officers were located miles from the AA stations.

On some of the ships, gunsights were even removed and circuits to fire control directors were defused.

As the days ticked away, more and more suspicious messages were decoded by the Purple machine. Messages directed embassy officials to burn code books. There was also an increasing allusion to the phrase "east wind rain," in the dispatches, which boggled the intelligence community.

In another chilling development, the total disappearance of 10 Japanese aircraft carriers from radio transmission had been discovered. The force had, in effect, vanished from American monitors during the last week of November.

On Thursday, Dec. 4, the carrier Lexington led Task Force 2 out of port. It and the carrier Enterprise were taking a shipment of planes to Wake and Midway islands.

The Japanese knew of the carrier movements, thanks to a spy working for them. The Japanese Consul to Hawaii, Nagao Kita, filed daily reports to Tokyo of the positions and the movements of the Pacific Fleet. None of Kita's transmissions could be decoded in Honolulu since there were no Purple machines in Hawaii. As a result, the decoding had to be done on the mainland, and the turnaround time was far too slow. Due to poor organization among other problems, many transmissions were lost before they were decoded.

On the night of Dec. 4, Kita filed a final message, detailing the exact position and make of each ship in the Harbor.

American leaders cocky on eve of war

FDR makes last appeal to emperor

Hirohito gives final OK to war

In Washington, more and more evidence of a possible Japanese invasion of the Philippines was becoming apparent. British sources also confirmed the Imperial task force sighted earlier by the United States.

Chest thumping was also apparent. Many high ranking Washington officials were confident the military was out-thinking the Japanese.

On Friday, Dec. 5, Frank Knox, the Secretary of the Navy was writing his annual state of the Navy address that he would give on Sunday morning. In it, he wrote:

"I am proud to report that the American people may feel fully confident in the Navy. In my opinion, the U.S. Navy is second to none."

And on an inspection tour of U.S. installations in Puerto Rico, Sen. Ralph Brewster, R-Maine, was quoted as saying, "The United States Navy can defeat the Japanese Navy any place and at any time."

On Saturday, Dec. 6, Washington had fully braced for an attack at Malaya. The 70-ship armada had been spotted again by British intelligence of Cambodia Point, sailing slowly westward.

Both Secretary Hull and Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson agreed that the Allies were in "imminent danger."

At the White House, Roosevelt commented to caller Budget Director Harold Smith, "We might be at war with Japan," though Smith took it as an offhand remark.

After lunch, Roosevelt dictated a personal appeal to Emperor Hirohito to end all aggression.

That night, Hirohito gave the final go-ahead to the attack on Pearl Harbor. Several crucial messages were dispatched to and from Tokyo and caught by the Purple machines.

Unfortunately, it was a Saturday night when the messages were decoded, and too few of the important officials could be reached because they were out on the town.

Saturday night bled into Sunday morning. In Honolulu, Station KGMB kept playing records as requested by the military instead of signing off at midnight as usual. A flight of 12 B-17s, flying from Oakland en route to Manila, needed the commercial radio transmission for navigation since military installations were maintaining radio silence.

Morning papers were running off Honolulu's printing presses with the headline: "FDR WILL SEND MESSAGE TO EMPEROR ON WAR CRISIS."

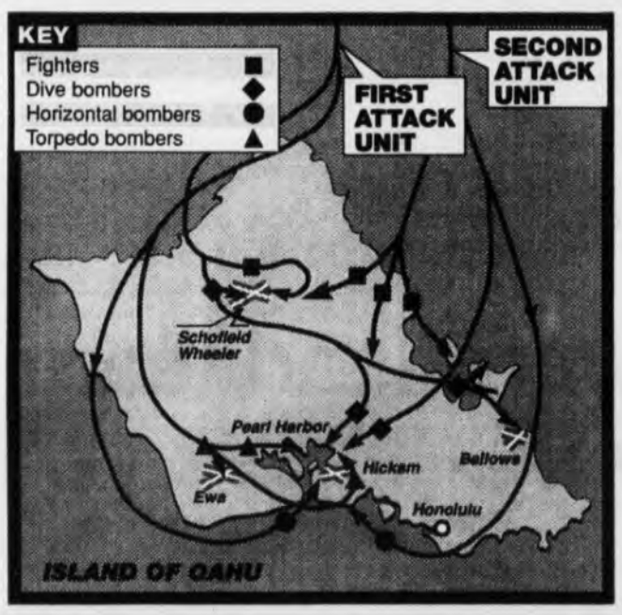
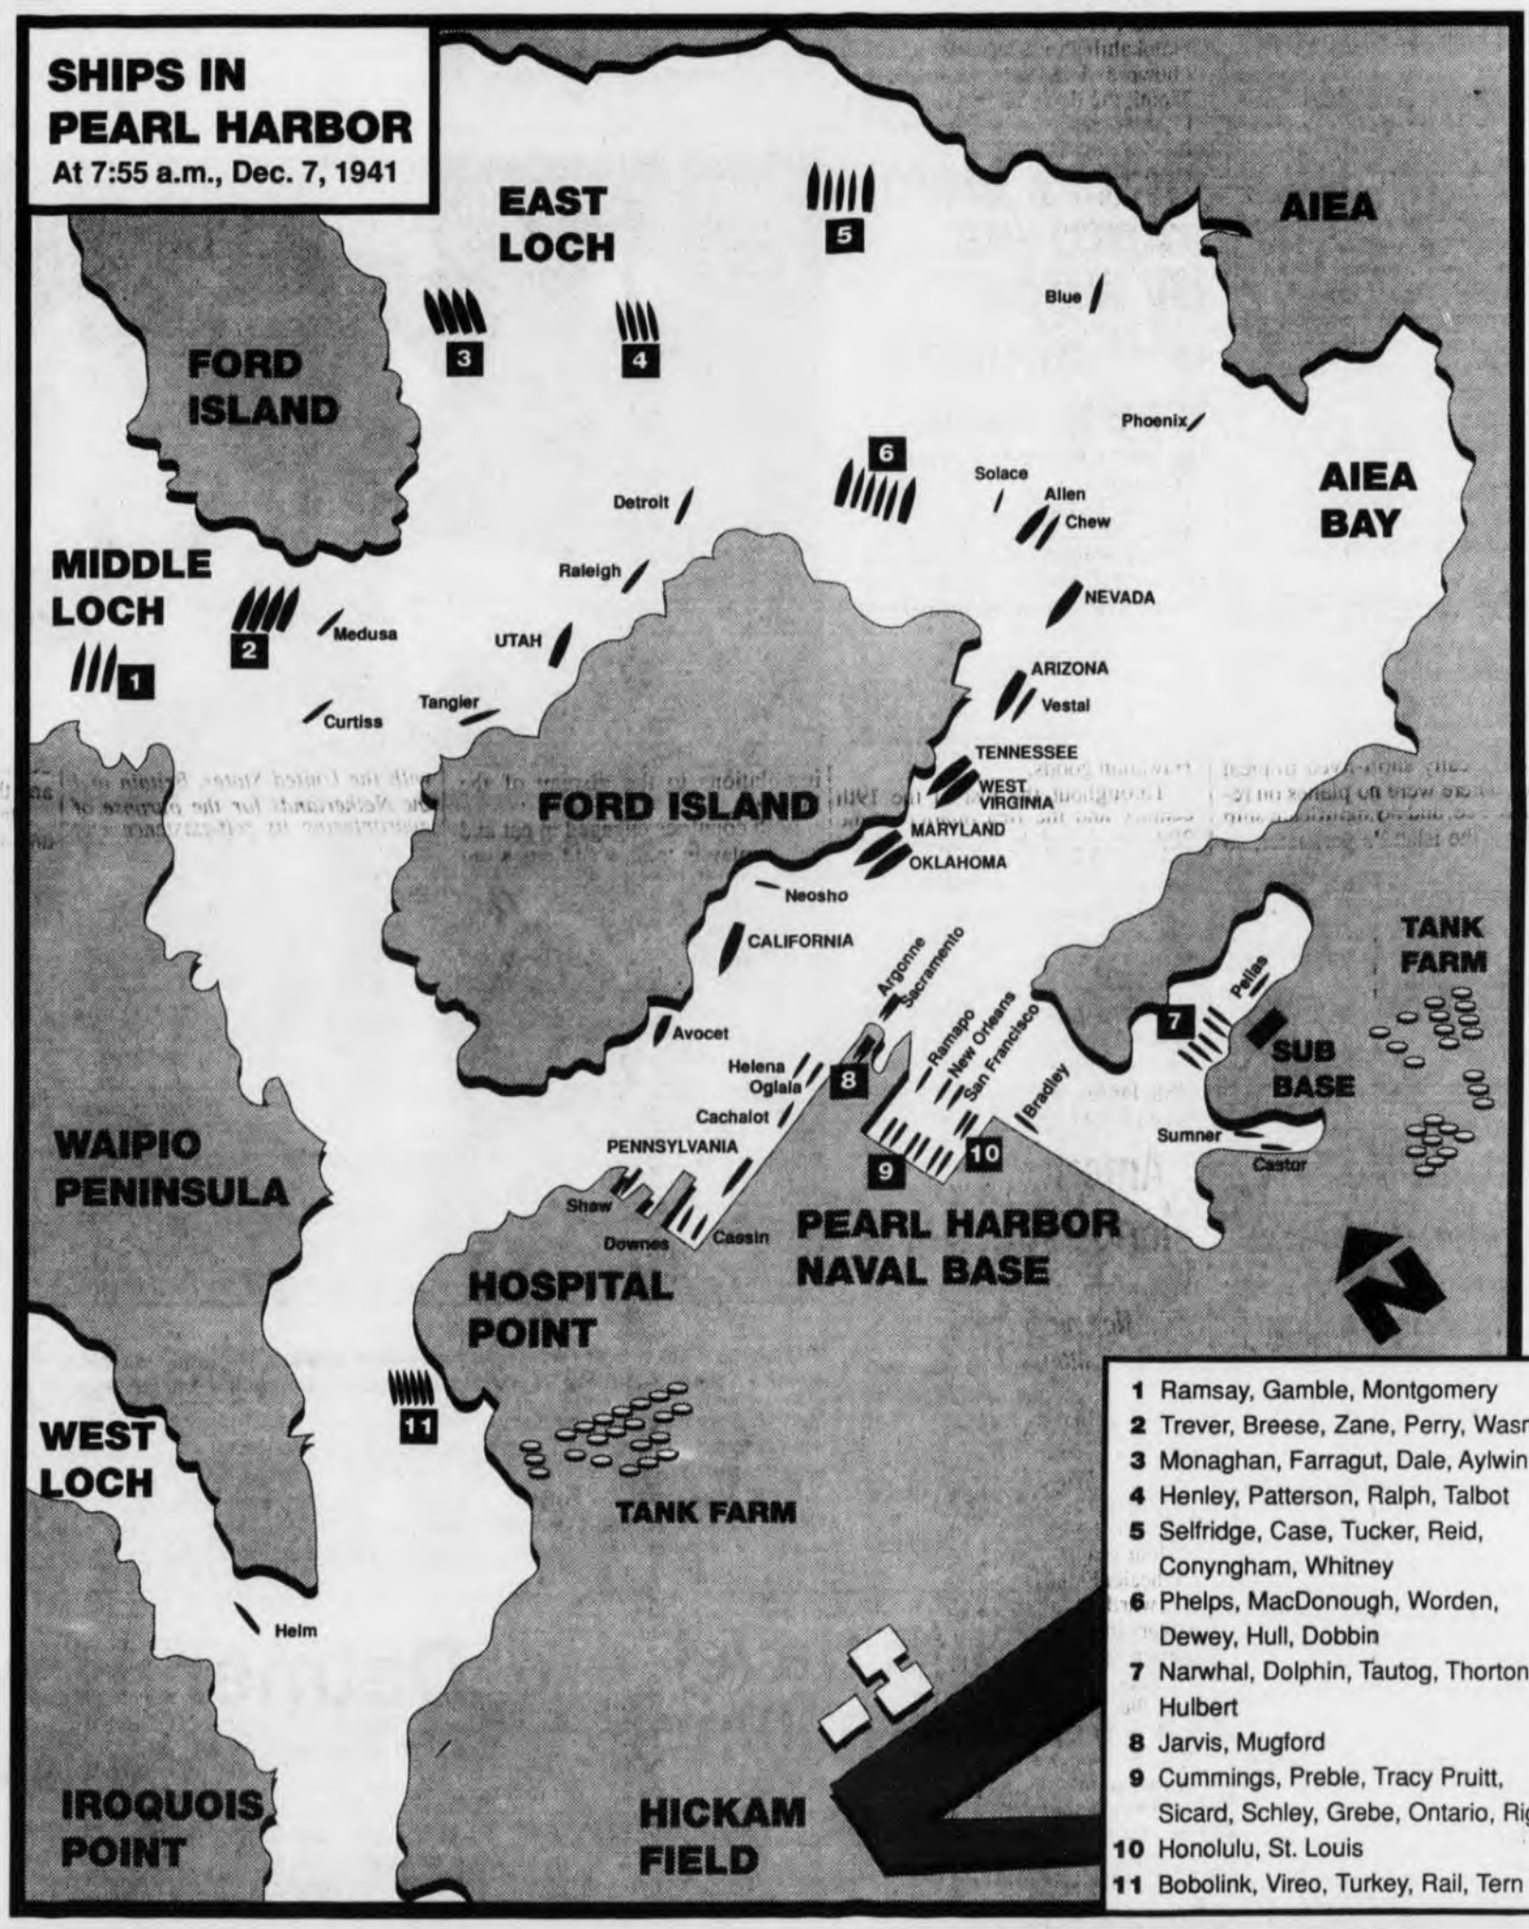
PEOPLE



- 2,403 Americans, 1,178 of them on the Arizona.
- Almost 70 civilians were killed in Honolulu when friendly anti-aircraft shells with faulty timing fuses landed in the city and detonated.

PLANES

- 188 U.S. airplanes were destroyed at the airfields.



ENEMY LOSSES

- 29 of 152 planes, fine midget submarines and one large submarine. Loss of life is unknown.

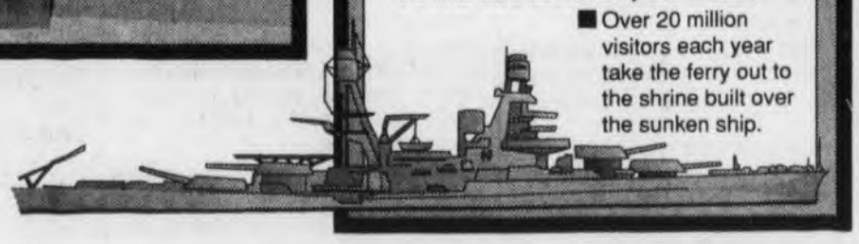
U.S.S. NEVADA

"The Cheer-up Ship"

The Nevada has one of the most colorful and lucky histories of any of the ships in Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941.

- Trying to escape from the attack, the battleship was hit by a torpedo and two bombs near the entrance to the harbor.
- She was eventually refloated, repaired and sent back to the west coast for modernization.
- The Nevada played a key role in the invasion of Normandy.
- After the war, she was used as a target ship for nuclear tests in the Pacific. She survived these tests.
- She was eventually sunk in 1948 while being used for surface-to-ship target practice only 65 miles from Oahu.



The Nevada engulfed in smoke after taking a torpedo on her port side.

U.S.S. ARIZONA

The most famous ship caught in the Pearl Harbor attack was probably the Arizona. She had taken numerous hits early in the raid and had sunk to the bottom of the harbor in the first 15 minutes of the attack.

- The Arizona was the first ship that sank in the attack when one of the first bombs dropped ignited the ammunition magazines on the battleship.
- 1,178 men are entombed in the Arizona, which still rests at the bottom of the harbor.
- Since it sank, a drop of oil surfaces from the Arizona's tanks every 20 minutes.
- Over 20 million visitors each year take the ferry out to the shrine built over the sunken ship.

JAPANESE ZERO FIGHTER

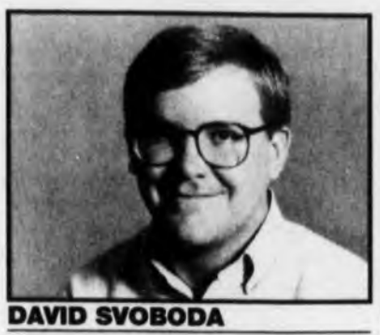
Pearl Harbor was the first test for a new Japanese fighter, the Zero. Made by the Mitsubishi Company, the fighter employed many new technological innovations that gave the Zero an overpowering advantage against U.S. fighters during the early days of the war.

Constant Speed Propeller

- The Zero's engine could run at full power the whole time the plane was in the air. The angle of the propeller's blades changed their angle of attack to change airspeed.

Retractable Landing Gear

- This was the first Japanese fighter to use retractable landing gear to cut down on drag.



Twisted Wings

- The ends of the wings had slight twists in them to give the Zero an advantage in dog-fighting.

Baseball shuffling underway

Go figure.

The free-agent signings and initial trades of this baseball off-season would indicate that you'll need scorecards to identify all the new faces on each club when spring training opens in March.

And that's great, because all of this activity keeps the hot stove fire burning.

But it's bad, too, because the recent free-agent signings have taken an already out-of-whack salary structure and made it even more laughable.

While not professing to be Peter Gammons — though I sat next to him on press row during the 1985 World Series in Kansas City — here are a few Diamond Notes on the off-field activity since the blow off of the bat of Dan Gladden ended the Fall Classic in Minneapolis.

The big news in the big leagues this week was the signing of Bobby Bonilla by the New York Mets to a five-year, $29-million contract. That's just a few bucks short of landing Bonilla up there by Col. Steve Austin.

You remember him, don't you? He was the Six Million Dollar Man.

I'm sorry, but if Bobby Bonilla is worth almost $6 million a season, then there are about 25 major league players who have to be at home licking their chops right now.

One of them is Danny Tartabull, who's a lock to be playing any place but Kansas City next season.

When Royals public relations guru Dean Vogelaar was in Manhattan last month, he all but admitted that the Royals had written off Tartabull and developed a strategy for living life without Danny.

But you knew that already, didn't you?

What you probably already know as well is the fact that the California Angels — yep, a team in the same division as KC — have the inside track at signing Tartabull. And with Whitey Herzog as the general manager controlling owner Gene Autry's pocketbook, California will likely do whatever it has to in its attempt to sign the hard-hitting outfielder.

One has to wonder, though, what with the naming of former Royals manager John Wathan as the Angels' third-base coach will do to the team's chances of signing Tartabull. Tartabull was never a big Wathan fan, and that could be a key here.

But with Tartabull heading out the door, will the Royals have any offensive punch? Well, evidently KC GM Herk Robinson has been asking himself that same question. And evidently he's been doing it over the phone, using pitcher Kevin Appier's name as the bait with which he hopes to land a big fish to help replace the soon-to-be-departed Bull.

If a deal is made involving Appier, New York Mets outfielder Kevin McReynolds and Boston Red Sox outfielders Ellis Burks and Mike Greenwell would appear to be candidates to wear Royal blue next season. Greenwell has been rumored to be headed to KC forever, but he's just undergone surgery on his right elbow.

McReynolds would be a perfect fit in KC. He's a quiet, unassuming type who just goes out and puts up big numbers every year while playing fantastic defense. Burks would likely be another plus, if he can lose his reputation as a whiner. Maybe if you get him out of Boston — where Burks was long the lone black player on the club — he'll blossom under the leadership of Hal McRae.

Look for Appier or Tom Gordon to be gone for sure, unless the unspeakable happens. The unspeakable is the movement of Bret Saberhagen to a different address. KC might just be tempted to part with its ace if the names Barry Bonds, Joe Carter, Will Clark or Frank Thomas were to come up in discussion. And they all have, believe it or not.

Cats believe they owe somebody

Poor performance in last game motivates team for Delaware State

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

A theory in the sports world states that you never want to play a team that embarrassed itself in its previous appearance.

If the Delaware State basketball team buys into this, the Hornets must be shaking in their Chuck Taylors right now.

No one seems more embarrassed than the Wildcats, who are determined to redeem themselves following their lackluster showing against Missouri-Rolla Monday. Players and coaches agreed that the Division II opponent was taken lightly and said the same won't happen when the Cats take on the Hornets Saturday.

"We try to treat each game like any other," Coach Dana Altman said. "We don't worry about firing them up for a game like Arkansas or something like that, because they're just anxious to play. But unfortunately, some people don't get as excited about some games just because of the names.

"You try to guard against it, but it's human nature."

Altman said that the inexperienced squad hasn't become comfortable with the unfamiliar offense or developed continuity. Neither the lack of continuity nor the Thanksgiving layoff that kept the team out of competition for nine days could be blamed for the disappointing performance, Altman said.

"I'm sure that had something to do with it, but that's giving an excuse, and I don't want to do that," Altman said. "There are going to be ups and downs with this team, and it is a learning process. If we learn something from it, then we can go on, and maybe that'll help us."

"I would say we have something to prove to our team, to our coach, and I would say, to the fans because we understand we did not play a good game, and that's not what we want to show," forward Deryl Cunningham said. "I would say going into Saturday, we'll be ready to play, and we won't take a team lightly."

Delaware State brings a 2-1 mark into the game, with its only loss coming at Wichita State Saturday. The Hornets led by as many as nine in the second half, but the Shockers used full-court pressure to gain the lead in the final minutes.

Delaware State bounced back to beat Lincoln (Pa.) 101-81 on Tuesday.

"Their guards score a lot of points and are something we are concerned about," Altman said. "They threw a lot of different defenses at Wichita State, and that concerns us because we haven't faced a variety of defenses, so the game is definitely going to present some challenges for us."

Both the Hornets' starting guards, Roy Williams and Andrew Miles, enter the game with 16-point scoring averages to lead the team. Altman hopes to negate the Hornet threat with the defense of K-State's guards, particularly Vincent Jackson.

"I think one of our strengths is the defensive ability of our guards," Altman said. "Our quickness and athleticism at the guard spots enable us to really pressure some people. We did not do that Monday night, and we made some mistakes defensively, but we hope to correct those things against Delaware State."

Rugby team improves by leaps and bounds

K-State travels to Western tourney

By the Collegian Staff

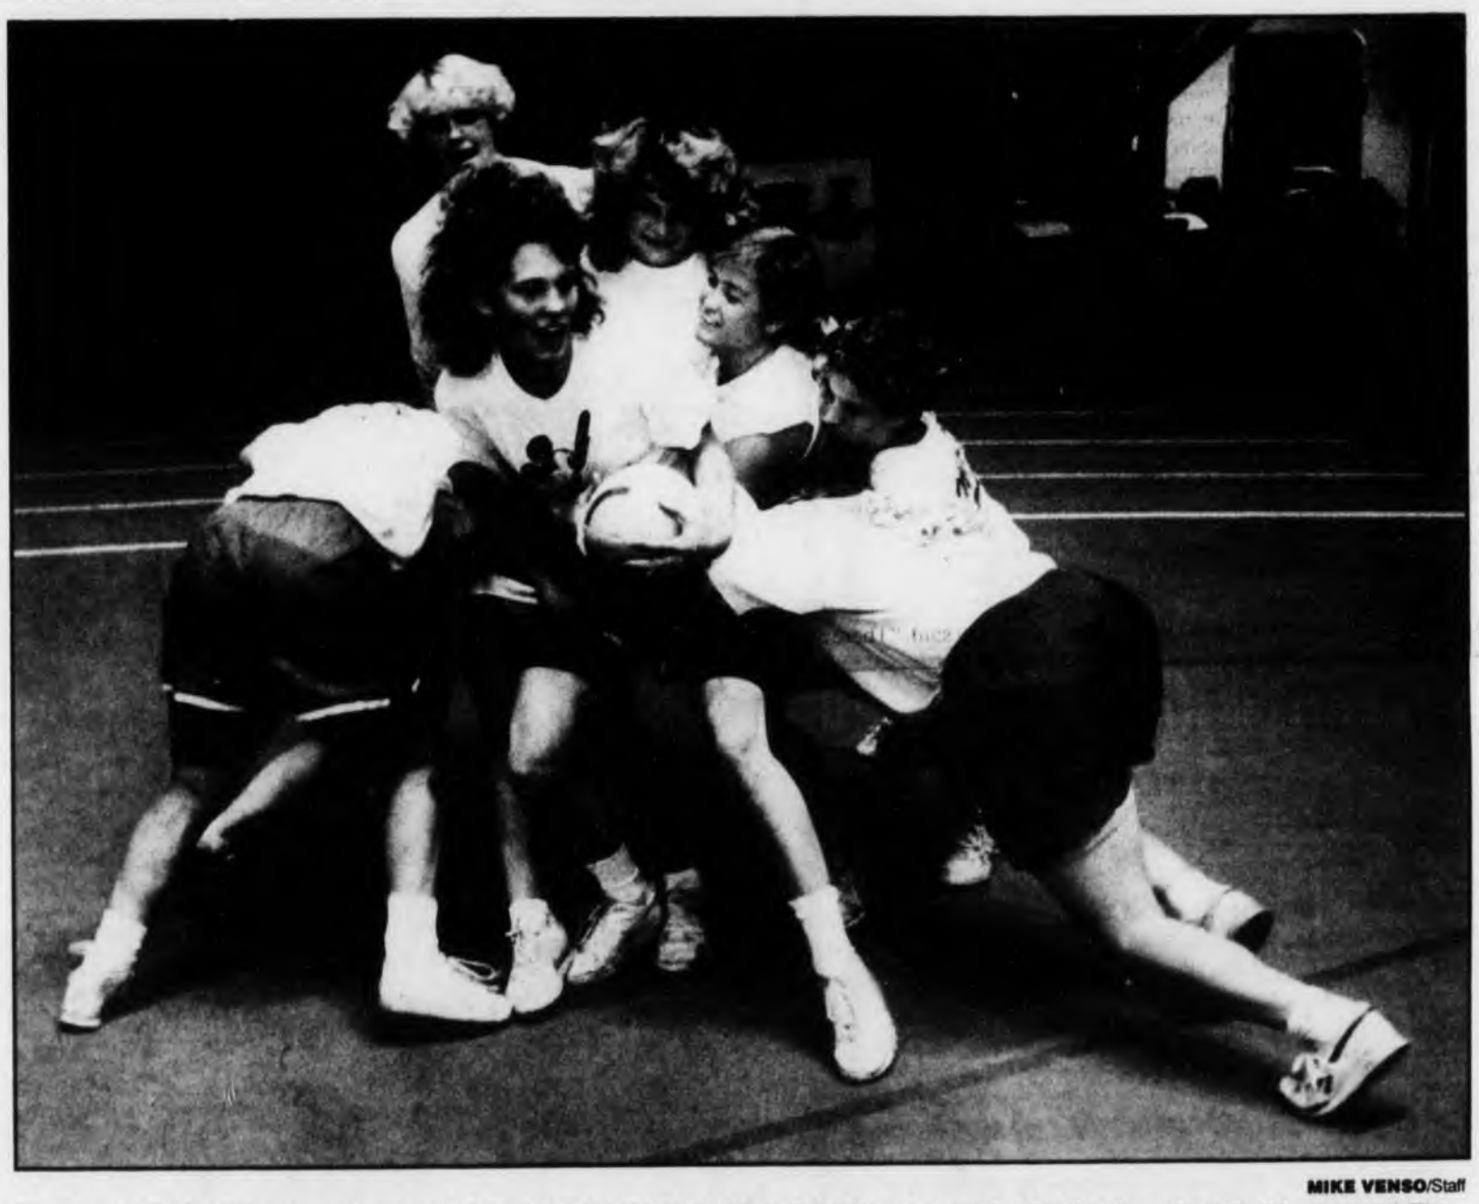
After a winless season a year ago, this might have been the last thing anyone expected from the K-State women's rugby team.

But K-State will take a 12-0 fall record into the Western Territorial Select Side Trials Saturday and Sunday in Dallas. The four-team tournament will be played to determine a territorial champion, with top players from each team representing the Western territory at the Interterritorial Trials against select teams from three other regions.

For K-State, participating in the trials adds to a remarkable turnaround. The club not only won all 12 of its matches, but posted shutouts against nine opponents and won two tournaments.

"Last season, we failed to win a single game," K-State rugby player Mimi Doukas said. "Many members of our team are in the Army and were called to Desert Storm. They're back now and helped our team tremendously."

K-State, which will represent the Heart of America region, will play Colorado in its first-round game. Colorado qualified as the Eastern Rocky Rugby Union's entry. The other opening-round match will feature select teams from Missouri and Texas, with the winners of each match meeting Sunday for the championship.



Three other teams that qualified for the tournament, but will not compete, are Ozark region representative Arkansas, Rio Grande region qualifier Oklahoma, and Great Plains member Nebraska.

Several of K-State's 25 players will not be able to make the trip because of schedule conflicts, but the squad will take players from Kansas City to fill its roster.

"Many of our backs will not be going, which may hurt the team," Doukas said. "But the scrum is complete and should stay strong. The Kansas City players we picked up will be used to fill in the back line."

K-State's march to the Trials has been an impressive one. The squad won the Heart of America Tournament in Kansas City with wins over St. Louis and Iowa State and a 16-4 victory over Denver in the championship game.

K-State has outscored its opponents 195-19 this season.

Lady Cats travel to Northern Illinois

K-State plays Big 10 champion in opening round

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

The Lady Cat basketball team is about to begin learning whether Tuesday night's win over Oral Roberts is the beginning of something special or just a momentary stoppage of bleeding.

That learning process will begin tonight, as Coach Susan Yow's club, 1-2, travels to DeKalb, Ill., for a game against Purdue in the opening round of the Northern Illinois University/GTE Fastbreak Fest.

"We've really been struggling," Yow admitted after the win over Oral Roberts. "I was concerned. I think we can be sharper, can be more intense. Hopefully this was the beginning of that."

K-State will need every bit of sharpness and intensity it can muster in its opening-round tilt against Purdue.

The Boilermakers return two starters and seven letterwinners off of a team that was 26-3 a year ago and went 17-1 in the Big Ten to take the conference title. Coach Linn Dunn's team is led by senior guard MaChelle Joseph, who averaged 20.3 points an 3.5 rebounds a game one year ago.

Forward Leah Honeycutt, who has been the Lady Cat leader through the first three games, said that it was just a matter of time until the team got a "W." Now, Honeycutt hopes the team can build on that first brick.

"We wanted it," Honeycutt said of the win over the Titans. "The offense is coming along a little better now, and I think I know what the coaches want. So do the other players. Hopefully, that will show now."

One of the players who has emerged over the first three games is Kelly Moylan, a junior from Emmett who toiled in relative obscurity over her first two seasons in Manhattan, only to become a starter this year. She had 17 points Tuesday night.

Moylan's shooting ability has impressed Yow.

"Kelly has a nice shot," Yow said. "All we had to do was move the ball and get it in her hands more. That's a big part of our offense."

Moylan said the zone employed by ORU played right into her hands. Its a defensive scheme she hopes Purdue uses.

"When Coach tells me that they're going to play zone, my eyes light up," Moylan said. "I always want to shoot it, but when they're playing a zone, I look to shoot it a little more."

Detmer, Howard lead team

By the Associated Press

Heisman Trophy favorite Desmond Howard of Michigan, freshman phenom Marshall Faulk of San Diego State and all-time passing leader Ty Detmer of Brigham Young were named to the 1991 Associated Press All-America college football team Thursday.

K-State wide receiver Michael Smith was a third-team selection. The Big Eight placed two players on the first team, two on the second team and five on the third team.

Howard, who is nicknamed Magic, lived up to his billing with a spectacular season. The triple-threat wide receiver averaged 159 yards per game and was the nation's second-leading scorer with 23 touchdowns, many coming on his trademark diving catch. Two of his TDs came on a 93-yard kickoff return and a 93-yard punt return.

Faulk led the country in rushing and scoring, the first freshman to finish on top in either category. He is only the third freshman to make the AP first team since they became eligible for varsity competition in 1972. The others were Georgia's Herschel Walker in 1980 and Pittsburgh's Tony Dorsett in 1973.

Despite missing three games with an injury, Faulk rushed for 1,429 yards and scored 140 points. He gained 386 yards against Pacific.

Biology class innovating

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

Since 1968, the Principles of Biology lab has not been taught by instructors. Stephanie Teasley, freshman in anthropology, listens to a taped lecture in the Ackert Hall lab. Students enrolled in the class must also attend a recitation class where a professor helps them with assignments.

Audio-tutorial teaching format motivates students to learn on their own

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

A student with noteboook and pen in hand carefully examines a scorpion specimen sitting on the cabinet in preparation for a test on Monday.

The student is participating in the lab for Principles of Biology class. The class has been taught with an audio-tutorial format for 23 years. This means that there is not a formal lecture, but students listen to headsets to get information.

The tapes, which are prepared by several professors in the biology department, require hands-on participation from the students by instructing them to complete certain tasks. For example, students may be required to study an evolution chart that is set up in the lab and answer questions about it.

John Zimmerman, professor of biology, incorporated the format in 1968 to spur students to learn on their own, instead of sitting and passively listening to a lecture.

"Lots of times, students attend a lecture and think they've met the requirements," Zimmerman said. "This class demands a certain level of maturity. It doesn't work unless they become actively involved."

Zimmerman said he heard of the idea at a time when education was in a declining state, the early 1960s. At the same time, the K-State biological science department was undergoing changes such as new divisions and class mergers. People wanted something in education that was innovative.

Dale Kennedy, a lab instructor for the class, said the self-directed format is still considered innovative after 23 years because it relies so heavily on the student's own motivation to learn.

"If the student is willing to try, the options are right there in front of them," Kennedy said. "There are five hours of help sessions a week where they can meet with professors, and they are given the objectives that will be on the tests."

Students enrolled in the class are typically freshmen who haven't had much exposure to self-directed learning classes.

Laura Huebner, sophomore in arts and sciences, said she agrees with the basic premise of the class, but said it has its shortcomings.

"I like it because you can work at the your own pace until you fully understand the material," Huebner said. "But a lecture would be nice so you could ask questions right there in class."

Other classes that use a hands-on, self-directed type of learning are the foreign language labs and television production classes at Bob Dole Hall, in which state-of-the-art equipment is used by students in educational and correspondence classes.

While the equipment used for the biology class may not be state-of-the-art, the department is constantly looking for ways to improve it.

Jerry Weis, associate director of biology, said the department hopes to aquire three new computers in the spring with which students could use computer simulations to help them understand the principles and philosophies of biology.

New Senate members learn procedures

Resolution approving ASK delegates passes

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

Student senators breezed through Thursday night's one-and-a-half-hour meeting, which mainly was to orient the new senators to Senate's procedures and protocol.

SENATE

Justin Sanders, graduate student in physics and former student senator, occupied the bulk of the meeting with review of how to write legislation, what to do during the question and debate periods and some basic parliamentary procedures.

Lengthy question periods are analagous to "the outhouse that smells bad," Sanders said. "You've got to consider what you've been doing to contribute to that."

To prevent such extensive periods, Sanders' main advice to the senators was "Keep it brief."

The most important part of Senate meetings is debate and dealing with the students' money, he said.

"I practiced my debate speeches in the shower," he said. "When I got all pruney, I knew my speech was too long."

In the meeting's only vote, senators unanimously passed a resolution to approve delegates and alternates to the Associated Students of Kansas Policy Council. Every student attending a regent school is a member of ASK, and anyone can be on the council. All six regent schools in Kansas send their student body presidents as delegates, along with up to four other Senate-approved students.

The delegates meet to discuss what issues they would like to lobby for at the Statehouse in Topeka.

Those approved student delegates are Erin Burke, junior in journalism and mass communications; Kenton Epard, junior in electrical engineering; Todd Heitschmidt, graduate student in agricultural economics; and Ann Woodbury, junior in business administration.

Evans said she is now more open to the complexity of meaning in the landscape. While dealing with the bombing sites she said she was struck by how similar the shapes are with ancient sacred symbols, and she said she wondered if these shapes were our sacred symbols.

"At first I didn't want land to be used for anything, I just wanted it to be there," said Evans.

However, she said she has begun to see the natural evolution of time with her current project. It deals with the small rural town of Matfield Green on Kansas Highway 177. She said she was intrigued by how agriculture had taken over the community.

"The saddest thing is the abandoned human artifacts, it looks like people just up and left," Evans said.

Corgan glad he's a smash

Band's leader wanted fame from the start

ROD GILLESPIE
A&E Writer

Billy Corgan, guitarist/vocalist for Smashing Pumpkins, always believed he would be famous.

"To be completely honest, I wanted to be in this position," Corgan says. "I never wanted to be in the position of anything less."

But Corgan, the band's frontman, realizes he could just as easily be struggling in anonymity instead of being part of "the next big thing."

"It kinda sounds like hindsight because, if we were in a different position, I'd probably be rationalizing that," he says, grinning.

Corgan is slumped in his chair with a towel wrapped around his head, looking exhausted but happy. He should be. He and his band have just finished an electrifying set at Kansas City's Memorial Hall, part of a three-band bill Wednesday with Pearl Jam and the Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Corgan is holding court with the journalists of the music underground. As the band's sole songwriter and lead singer, he has molded the Pumpkins to relay his vision. And after the show, he is the band's spokesman.

The other members seem to be content in the background, both onstage and off. The band's bassist, D'Arcy, answers a few questions and then excuses herself. Drummer Jimmy Chamberlin tries vainly to get a few words in edgewise. Ignored by the jackals of the alternative press, he shrugs and leaves as well.

"Usually when we play like we did tonight, we tend to choose sheer emotional intensity over musicality," Corgan says. "In my mind, it really doesn't matter how well you play technically if you're transferring emotional energy. "

Thunderous overtones from the Chili Peppers set penetrate deep into this tiny backstage dressing room in the bowels of the auditorium. Every time someone enters the room, a wall of sound washes in, making conversation difficult.

"James, shut the door," Corgan barks.

James Iha, the band's other guitarist, enters the room with a shit-eating grin. Clutching a box full of soft drinks, he proudly claims to have cleaned out the caterer's inventory. The beverages will be needed when the band piles into its van for the 11-hour drive to New Orleans, the next stop on the tour.

The constant touring has taken its toll, making it increasingly difficult to sustain stage intensity night to night.

"We've only been home three weeks since June," Corgan says wearily. "One thing that you learn when you tour and tour and tour is that you better like your songs. You better be comfortable with them because they're in your face every night. If you have to grit your teeth through one of your songs ..." His voice trails off.

Some of the band's most popular songs fall into the "gritting your teeth" category.

"'I Am One' is a hard one to play," he muses. "We've been playing it for three years. It doesn't have as much weight for us as it once did. It has nothing to do with whether the songs are good or bad. It's just that you as a person have lost some emotional momentum behind the song."

To combat the road weariness, the Pumpkins mix in new songs with old to stay fresh. Corgan said the new tunes are being forged in the fire of live performances.

"It's very important to us to have new songs in the set because it breathes new life," he says. "It allows this counterpoint between the old and the new so that you get this 'new' feeling going all the time. I don't know how bands can go out and play songs off their albums every night. We couldn't do it."

To Corgan, onstage energy is vital to a band's survival. Noting that some acts continue going through the motions for a paycheck, he hopes the Pumpkins quit before they lose enthusiasm for their music.

"When the band reaches the 'end of the band,' we want to be able to look at it objectively, and, hopefully, we'll have made good, solid decisions based on art and not money," he says. "Not be 40 and out on humongous stages putting out movies and records of songs we did 25 years before. We don't want that. We really want to burn as hard and bright as we can."

"To not be a parody or a cliche, which I think a lot of bands that become mega-successful do," Iha says. "They always have their great periods, and then they become like a joke."

Rock bands jam Memorial Hall

Chili Peppers please crowd with mix of funkadelic rock, entertaining stage antics

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

It was a freakshow at its finest. And some damn good music, too.

The Red Hot Chili Peppers, Smashing Pumpkins and Pearl Jam filled Memorial Hall in Kansas City, Kan., to near capacity Wednesday night with a fan combination that was colorful, to say the least.

REVIEW

Pearl Jam primed the audience, opening with the band's signature hypnotic yet obvious rock-oriented sound. Yet another powerful band from the well-publicized Seattle scene, the group spun through its set list of consistently one-word titled songs like "Porch," "Once" and "Deep."

Lead singer Eddie Vedder sported a flirtatious rapport with the crowd that would make corporate rock marketers drool. Near the end of the group's short set, Vedder told the audience: "These guys up here in front keep motioning for me to jump in the crowd — do you think I should trust them?"

Of course, the response was an overwhelming, "yes," but it wasn't until after a few "psyches" that he did. Vedder then swam a lap over the mosh pit, much like the popular scene in the "Doors" movie.

Smashing Pumpkins followed, with songs that manipulated fans on the floor like the catalyst to a chemical reaction. As the group would withdraw its sound to a dream-like state, the movement on the floor would grind to a halt. Then, without notice, the artists would kick in a driving groove that commanded the body to follow. This one-two punch combo kept the show fresh and thrilling to the end.

The Chili Peppers headlined the show and were the crowd favorite, although not by as obvious a margin as most shows. Anthony Kiedis and Co. produced their usual deadly mix of funkadelic rock and entertaining stage antics.

Many of the songs performed were from the new album, although the band did songs from "Mother's Milk" and "Uplift Mofo Party Plan."

The show had several highlights, one of which was a burning cover of Stevie Wonder's "Higher Ground," off the "Mother's Milk" album. This song sounds great as a recording, but live it was nothing short of incredible.

Bassist Flea confirmed his position as one of rock's greatest in "Stone Cold Bush." Between his smoking solos and the guitar work of John Frusciante, this song was one of the musically superior of the show.

"Suck My Kiss" and "Give It Away" sparked immediate expansion of the pit activity. Although these tracks on the new album are drawing pop appeal — the kiss of death for alternative fans — it didn't seem to affect the crowd at the time.

A slight disappointment occurred with the choice of the encore. The group performed the title track off "Blood Sugar Sex Magik," by far one of the weaker songs on the album. The crowd response was more like a cooldown to an extended aerobics session than a rousing finale.

However, the very fact that the opportunity existed to see these three great groups in a venue as intimate as Memorial makes up for any drawbacks.

Besides, the people watching were excellent. At one time, I was standing between a clean-cut guy with greek letters on his shirt and a teenage girl sporting an animal skin vest and a blue mohawk.

And even though I will probably need a whiplash collar for the rest of the weekend, it was well worth it all.

'The Butcher's Wife' fast-paced

Movie's story entertaining, crazy, full of surprises

EMILY JOHNSON
A&E Writer

Some movies often go unnoticed by the public, and although they're not Academy Award nominees, they are still enjoyable. "The Butcher's Wife" is likely to be one of those movies.

REVIEW

"The Butcher's Wife," however, shouldn't be overlooked, because this movie is full of charm and surprises.

Marina Darbel (Demi Moore) is a young, beautiful gypsy from North Carolina. One day, her "magnified" woman's intuition tells her she will soon be face to face with the man she will marry.

Before Marina has time to prepare, Leo Limke, a butcher from New York, comes along and takes her back home, making Marina the butcher's wife.

Stunned by her beauty and mysterious personality, Leo is unprepared for the surprises and turnarounds that lay ahead. Soon, the whole town learns of the butcher's wife and her ability to see into the future. Little does the butcher know that his wife's clairvoyance will spark the discovery of a talented young artist, the dawn of a blues singer, the beginning of a homosexual relationship and the butcher's own adultery.

Within two days of her arrival, Marina faces some competition to her advice from the town's psychiatrist, Dr. Tremor. Tremor (Jeff Daniels) is having a professional nervous breakdown caused by the butcher's wife. Upon his first introduction to Marina, Tremor realizes he is falling in love with her.

The story of "The Butcher's Wife" is fast-paced and unrealistic, but that's one of the movie's strongest qualities. And if a movie can include all of this and still be enjoyable and unpredictable, it's worth watching.

Skinner chosen to replace ousted Sununu

Bush begins re-election bid with announcement

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush Thursday named Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner to replace John Sununu as White House chief of staff and unveiled the high command for a re-election campaign that looks tougher than it did a few months ago.

"When the economy goes down, the president takes a hit," Bush conceded at a White House news conference as he set the course for an 11-month re-election drive.

"Can I get re-elected?" Bush asked. "The answer is yes, because I am a good president." He said he would make a formal re-election announcement in January.

Acknowledging that the economy is "sluggish at best," Bush announced he was speeding up $9.7 billion in various government payments and benefits to help "get this country back on its feet."

Bush said the Democratic-controlled Congress has ignored his economic proposals for three straight years and that he would make new recommendations in 1992. He vowed to take them directly to the voters "over the heads" of Congress.

Bush's political team, as well as his new chief of staff, Skinner, and the old, Sununu, were crowded into the White House briefing room as he made his announcement.

In Skinner, Bush picked a long-time political supporter and a former federal prosecutor to replace the abrasive Sununu, who resigned Tuesday after months of controversy.

Skinner has been tapped before to help Bush in troubled times.

He took charge of the administration's response to the Exxon Valdez oil spill and the San Francisco earthquake, and most recently helped win a compromise with Congress on a $151-billion transportation bill.

For his re-election campaign, Bush named Commerce Secretary Robert Mosbacher as general chairman, pollster Robert Teeter as campaign chairman charged with plotting strategy and businessman Fred Malek as campaign manager responsible for the nuts and bolts operation of the re-election drive.

Bush's poll ratings have fallen sharply in recent months as the economy has weakened — including Thursday's report of a sharp rise in jobless claims — and he has been buffeted by criticism from Republicans as well as Democrats for appearing indecisive on domestic issues.

In addition, former Ku Klux Klan official David Duke announced plans on Wednesday to run in Republican primaries against Bush. Conservative commentator Patrick Buchanan also is expected to announce plans to challenge Bush's re-election bid.

Bush said he doesn't think he has a "major problem" with conservatives. "I consider myself conservative," he said.

The president took a strong swipe at Duke, who won a majority of the white vote in a Louisiana gubernatorial election, despite a losing effort. "I condemn bigotry, and I condemn racism. And this man is a racist, and he is a bigot," the president said.

Bush said Skinner, as chief of staff, would coordinate activities between the White House and re-election campaign and would do an "outstanding job for me and the country."

"Sam Skinner takes over as a firm right hand at a time when the nation's economy represents a difficult challenge," Bush said.

"Yes, people are out of work, and we need to get this country back on its feet."

Bush was asked if he could be re-elected by asking the voters the same question posed by Ronald Reagan in 1980 — "Are you better off than you were four years ago?" The president cited world peace and other events and said he expected the economy would improve next year.

Bush has long supported a cut in the capital gains tax, and the Congress has refused to enact it. Democrats say that would largely benefit the wealthy and have countered with proposals for income tax cuts for the middle class.

Also tapped for key campaign roles were Mary Matalin, chief of staff of the Republican National Committee, who will join the campaign full time as a senior official. GOP consultant Charles Black was tapped as a senior adviser.

Bush did not name Cabinet replacements for Skinner or Mosbacher.

Bush showed no interest in going over the events that led to Sununu's demise — the use of government planes for personal trips and his abrasive manner in dealing with members of Congress among them. Instead, he complimented his top aide for the way he handled his own departure.

Republican strategists said Bush wanted to erase doubts about his leadership and dispel the appearance of turmoil in the White House after a series of blunders on the economy and civil rights.

Designing way of life for artist

Creation of his own technique, important key to success, O'Briant says

MICHELLE POULIN
Collegian Reporter

There's an artist whose works are famous in Manhattan, but no one knows him.

Thomas O'Briant is a graphic artist for Ballard's Sporting Goods. His eyes, hands and heart touch almost every custom T-shirt that leaves the store.

Doris Marsh, graphic designer for Ballard's, said O'Briant was hired two years ago in response to the increased demand for graphic talent.

"We try very hard to give the customers what they want. The number of customers had grown, so we did too," Marsh said.

Marsh takes care of cleaning up the artwork brought in. O'Briant, on the other hand, is the mastermind behind creating a design from someone's thoughts.

Art has always been a way of life for O'Briant. All children doodle in school, but for O'Briant, it was not to curb boredom, but to create and have fun.

"I have to admit that in school I enjoyed art the best, even above recess," O'Briant said. "I took every art class available and was drawing cards for my friends' girlfriends before I was out of grade school. I think perhaps my best projects were signing parent names on absent slips."

O'Briant went to the Air Force after high school graduation, to K-State for two years and finally to Manhattan Area Vocational-Technical School.

"At K-State, I was in graphic art. Like so many, I left because of my impatience. I felt my other classes were getting in the way," O'Briant said.

Along the way, O'Briant said, he did learn some important lessons from his teachers. He said he learned how to have an open mind and how to create his own technique, rather than use book technique. He attributes this as a key to his success.

"I had one instructor say, 'I am not here to teach you how to draw, I am here to teach you how to open your mind when drawing,' and that's exactly what I'm trying to do."

O'Briant said one teacher told him, "I can't give you an A, I have to give you an A-, because you're good at what you draw, but it's not what I ask."

Maybe this is why customers who work with O'Briant leave satisfied.

O'Briant said his design secret is to watch the world with a keen eye. In order to create a design, he said, you must be extremely aware of your environment — watching lets you see what other people want.

"I consider what I do to be sculpting for the body. People who come to me have a point to express, and they have chosen T-shirts as the medium. It's up to me to create an advertisement for them," O'Briant said.

In our culture, he said, it's a fact that people look at the chest, and T-shirts provide an excellent billboard for getting your information across, whether it be a greek party or student government elections.

"I try to give everyone the best I can, but it's difficult to second guess a person. In many cases, it's second guessing 500 people," O'Briant said.

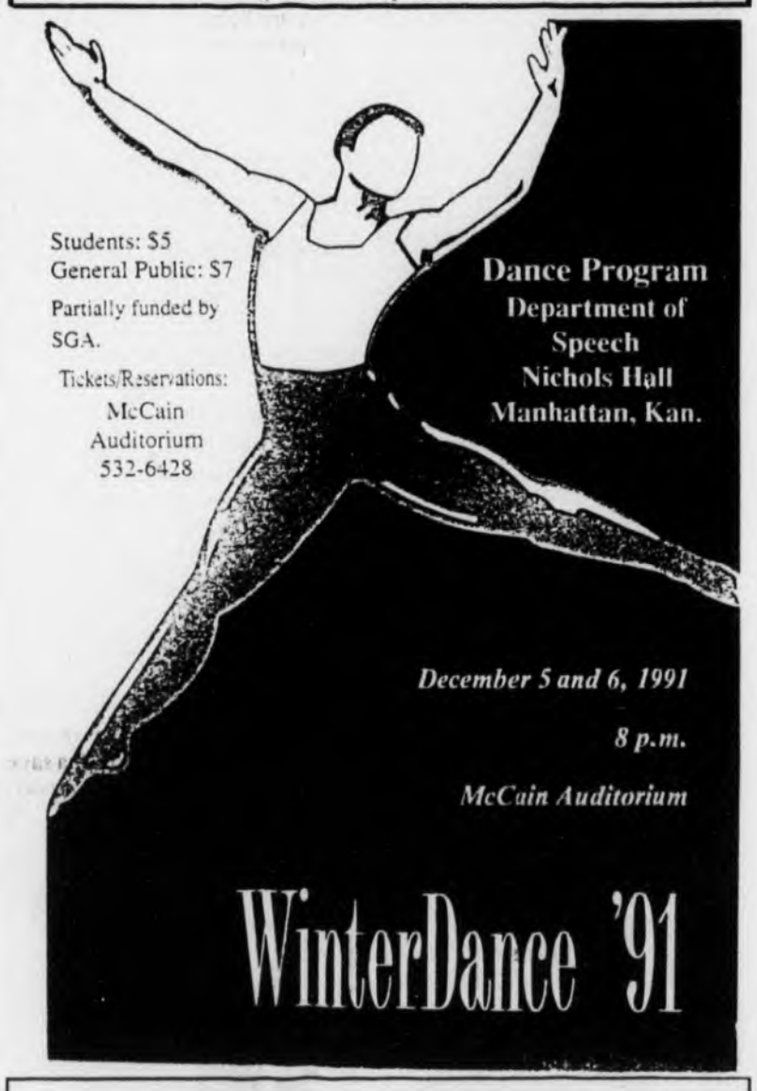
"I like college students, because they have an imagination. It's just sometimes they need help putting it on paper."

O'Briant said some customers come in with a theme and nothing else. In that case, his job begins with research.

"For example, I did a design for Acacia's 'Night on the Nile.' My first stop was the library for reference material. Then I worked up a couple of different sketches. The guy came in, picked the one he liked, and I made a final composite."

Because screen printing can be expensive, O'Briant said, all his drawings are approved by the customer before any screen is ever made. This helps the customer get what he/she wants and prevents wasted time and money.

"A typical thing for an artist to do is to sign his work. I never do that. My designs are for the customer, not myself," O'Briant said.



O'Briant said he guesses he has hundreds of designs on campus.

"It's a very gratifying feeling to see people wearing your designs on shirts instead of drawing them and then putting them away in a drawer."

ΠΒΦ BEAU & ARROW 1991

Kansas State University
Founded 1863
The party that happens but once a year,
We've all long awaited, it's finally here!
For some it's their first, but for us it's our last,
Beau & Arrow we call it. We'll make it a blast!
Armed with our Arrow, escorted by our Beau,
Champagne at our tables, the good times will flow!
Seniors are we from the class of '88, wish you all the best time-the evening will be great!!
Love,
The Seniors

testimony, he scoffed at her allegations.

"Obviously, we saw some very sad and some very dramatic testimony," Smith said. "But I've been living with these allegations, with this damnable lie for the past eight months and I hope everybody will be patient as I have been and allow me the opportunity with Roy's help to defend myself in the coming days."

He was referring to his lawyer Roy Black who got into only brief cross-examination before court recessed for the day. He was to continue Thursday.

The woman initially pleaded a poor memory when he quizzed her about details of the hours before she met Smith.

If convicted, Smith, 31, could be sentenced to 4 1/2 years in prison.

In court, Smith stood up as the slender, dark-haired woman in a dark gray suit and pearls identified him as the man she met at a trendy discotheque.

At one point, she sobbed so strenuously the prosecutor asked her if she wanted a break. She said she wanted to continue.

Asked, "Did you consider this an act of love?" She caught her breath and said, "Oh God, no."

She said she ran in terror from the man she had thought was a "nice guy" when they met at the nightclub earlier that night. She suggested he underwent a personality change, suddenly pouncing upon her without warning and with no sexual suggestions.

"I couldn't understand how this nice guy had turned into that one that raped me," she said, weeping.

When they arrived at the Kennedy estate, she said, Smith invited her to see the house and they strolled on the beach in front of the property where they encountered Sen. Kennedy and his son, Patrick, who walked past without a word.

"It struck me as a little odd," she said of the encounter at about 3 a.m. "Everyone was still awake. I thought about this seeing the house at 3 a.m. and I had second thoughts."

The woman said she and Smith kissed while on the beach and "it was getting a lot more romantic." But she insisted his kiss was not sexual.

Suddenly, she said, he declared he wanted to go swimming and began taking off his clothes. When he began opening his pants, she said, she turned and said she was leaving and began climbing a stairway up from the beach.

"I started up the stairs and I was at the top of the steps and my leg was grabbed," she said.

She said she broke loose and ran across the lawn and, "He tackled me and I was on the ground and he was on top of me."

After the rape, she said, she ran into the Kennedy house and tried to hide, but "I could hear him yelling for me."

She said she called her friend Anne Mercer to come and get her and was shaking so badly she tried to steady herself on a kitchen table, but Smith pursued her.

"He grabbed me again. He grabbed me by the arm. I thought he was going to kill me. I didn't know what he was going to do to me," she said bursting into tears again.

She said Smith pulled her into another room and seemed calm.

"He was real different," she said. "I was telling him, 'You've raped me. How could you do this?' He was sitting there very smug and he said, 'I didn't rape you.'"

When she said she would call the police, she said Smith told her, "No one will believe you."

Her friends arrived, she said, and she felt safer.

The next day, she said, she phoned her mother who was baby-sitting her 2-year-old daughter.

"I felt so ashamed and so dirty," she said. "I didn't want my daughter to see her mommy who'd been raped. I was a mess."

She said she didn't call police until the next day because, "I was too terrified of him, his family's power."

Smith sat 20 feet from the woman, staring straight at her throughout much of her emotional testimony. His aunts Ethel Kennedy and Eunice Shriver sat in the front row. Mrs. Kennedy kept her eyes down during the testimony.

The accuser said she doesn't remember clearly everything that happened when she went with Smith to the Kennedy estate.

"Why are you not able to remember clearly?" asked prosecutor Moira Lasch.

"Because I was raped," she said.

She used her hands expressively during testimony but looked only once at Smith when she identified him.

She said Smith never made any sexual suggestions to her and she felt in no danger when she agreed to give him a ride home.

The prosecutor asked if the woman expected to have sex with Smith and she said no.

"I did not want to have sex with him and I said no such thing," she said.

When he asked her in to see the house and took her down to the beach, she said, she still suspected nothing.

"I enjoyed his company. He was an intelligent man. He had done nothing suggestive. I had no fear of him. It was a nice night."

Ismail, a member of the Syrian delegation, said.

"The Palestinian delegation has requested that the co-sponsors arrange a time for the next session of these negotiations and to press for an immediate halt to Israel's procrastination and delaying tactics," said Hanan Ashrawi, a member of the Palestinian advisory group.

But Secretary of State James Baker III said, "We've made it very clear that we are here and open for business; we were, beginning on the 4th of December, and we will continue to be."

He told reporters during a picture-taking session with Nelson Mandela, a leader of the African National Congress, that "we will continue to hope that the parties themselves will get together."

Also, Baker rejected the idea that the United States should limit its intervention in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"We are going to continue to work to the extent that we can, and to be a catalyst for peace," he said. "Had we not done so in the past, I am not at all sure Madrid would have happened ... or, indeed, that the parties would be in Washington or on their way to Washington."

Earlier, Tutwiler told reporters: "There will be no new co-sponsor proposal."

At the same time, she declined to give assurances that the negotiations would open on Monday. "We cannot force anyone," the U.S. official said.

However, she also said, "We have no reason to believe the talks aren't going to go forward." She said the State Department will be open every day for negotiations between Arabs and Israelis.

Earlier, Palestinians said they were willing to negotiate with Israel next week, while Syria sought assurances from the United States that Israel would go ahead with the Mideast peace talks.

Syria's chief negotiator, Allaf, said after seeing Djerejian he hoped "as a result of these consultations things will move forward shortly."

But Sari Nusseibeh, a member of the Palestinian advisory group, objected to negotiations on Monday, fours years after the rebellion against Israel control of the West Bank and Gaza.

"We cannot have any talks on the 9th of December. We hope for talks before that or after that. But not the 9th, which is a national day for us," he said.

Baker set 10 a.m. Wednesday in Washington as the time and place for a resumption of the peace conference that recessed in Madrid, Spain, Nov. 4.

All the Arabs showed up, but Israel held to its decision to delay until next Monday. Israeli officials said they needed more time to prepare to negotiate with the Arabs on three fronts. Also, they insisted Baker acted without consulting them.

On Thursday, Israel did not appear again and the Arabs turned up only for talks with State Department officials.

Meanwhile, the Palestinian had some harsh words for the Bush administration.

One of "The Butcher's Wife"'s strongest qualities is its characters. Moore is a surprising success in a blond wig, a Carolina accent and in the portrayal of a mystic and charming character. Daniels is excellent as the die-hard psychiatrist who is experiencing a nervous breakdown himself.

The film's funniest character is Stella (Mary Steenbergen of "Parenthood"), the shy, conservative church choir director. With advice from Marina, Stella takes a big jump — giving up her pearls and turtleneck for a slinky blue dress to become a sexy blues singer.

The entire movie is filled with charm and unexpected changes in the plot and characters. The New York City setting is quaint, colorful and clean. Although this isn't quite a true-to-life portrayal of the city, it adds to the fantasy-like atmosphere of the movie.

With such an unrealistic and crazy plot, "The Butcher's Wife" may sound like a flop, but don't be disillusioned. This entertaining movie is like a Disney flick without the animation.

For Women Only
Memorial Hospital's new low-dose, film-screen mammography unit is designed and used exclusively for mammograms. Our service is professionally staffed by experienced radiologic technologists and it is fully accredited by the American College of Radiology.
One out of every nine women will develop breast cancer in her lifetime. The best defense and the key to surviving breast cancer is early detection. Mammograms done in conjunction with monthly breast self-examination (BSE) and annual exams by your doctor provide the most protection. What should you do?
• Practice breast self-examination monthly.
• Have a breast exam by your physician annually.
• When you reach the age of 35, ask your physician to schedule you for a baseline mammogram, and follow the American Cancer Society guidelines thereafter. Between the ages of 40 and 49, a mammogram should be done every one to two years, with a physical breast exam every year. After age 50, a mammogram and physical breast exam should be done every year.

Soviet Union no more

Commonwealth forged in alliance of Slavic republics

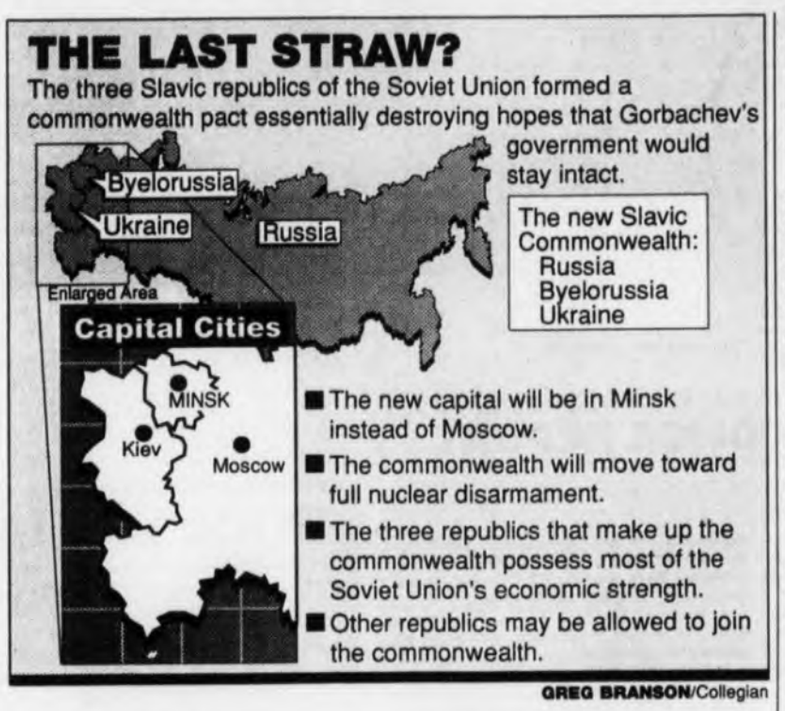
By the Associated Press

MINSK, U.S.S.R. — The Soviet Union's three Slavic republics — Russia, Byelorussia and Ukraine — declared Mikhail Gorbachev's government dead on Sunday and forged a new alliance.

The agreement creates a commonwealth of independent states with its capital in Minsk instead of Moscow, the news agency Tass said.

The accord defies Gorbachev's desperate appeals to preserve the Soviet Union under a new Union Treaty, but it was not clear whether it had legal force.

The 74-year-old Soviet Union as a subject of international and geopolitical reality no longer exists, Tass reported, referring to the preamble of one agreement.



Russia's president, Boris Yeltsin, already had stripped the central government of nearly all its functions and resources after the failure of a hard-line coup against Gorbachev in August. Sunday's agreement appears to take Gorbachev even further out of the country's political picture.

The pact, which topped Soviet and Russian TV newscasts late Sunday, also sought to assure the West that the new commonwealth would move toward full nuclear disarmament without Gorbachev.

Gorbachev's office said he had no immediate comment, but in a TV interview broadcast earlier Sunday he warned of economic and social collapse if the republics seceded.

Tass said the republics claimed authority to make the declaration as charter signatories of a 1922 Union Treaty that unified the country. It was unclear, however, whether the act had to be approved by other republics, voters or the already weakened central government.

Tass said the agreement stipulated that other republics could join the commonwealth, but there were was no immediate announcement from them.

Friction cooled between Russia, Ukraine in collapse of Soviet Union

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — The formation of a commonwealth by the three Slavic states of Russia, Ukraine and Byelorussia on Sunday seemed to be the coup de grace for the former Soviet Union and the government of Mikhail Gorbachev.

ANALYSIS

The agreement goes a long way toward cooling potentially explosive friction between Russia and Ukraine, the two most populous and wealthy of the former Soviet republics.

But it does not resolve a host of other questions stemming from the collapse of the Soviet Union. Those questions include the fate of Kazakhstan and other Asian republics that had been expected to remain in the Union.

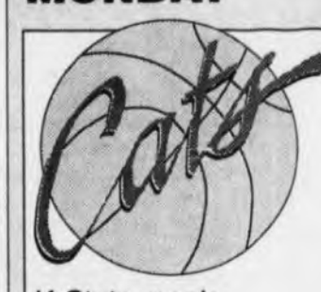
Russian Federation President Boris Yeltsin, newly elected Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk and Byelorussian leader Stanislav Shushkevich reached the agreement in a remote corner of Byelorussia.

It was the latest shock to the Soviet Union since Gorbachev became head of the Communist Party in March 1985. The most serious blow to the central government was a failed coup by party hard-liners in August.

Since the coup, Yeltsin and other republic leaders have stripped the central government of power. The Communist Party, formerly the country's main unifying force, virtually ceased to exist after Gorbachev quit his post as leader of the party and suspended its activities on Aug. 24. Yeltsin banned the party in Russia.

Since the coup, the three Baltic states have reasserted their independence. All of the other 12 Soviet republics, except Russia and Kazakhstan, have declared their independence.

But even after announcement of the Slavic Commonwealth, the exact shape of the new alliance was unclear.



"I do not know how future events will develop, since there are still Kazakhstan and the other republics," said Vladimir Mashits, Russian representative on the inter-republic council established after the coup to coordinate policy among the republics. "I wouldn't rush to an evaluation."

Before announcement of the commonwealth, Gorbachev insisted in an interview Sunday that it would take more than a declaration to bury the union.

"The union still exists," he told Ukrainian television. "Your brothers might say it doesn't, or they might

Analysis creates problems

Comparable-worth study meant to help but causes hurt

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

A comparable-worth study ordered to help solve the county's pay problems may have created some new ones for Riley County commissioners. County Clerk Ilene Colbert said she would like the commissioners to give her and other county officials a chance to discuss the results of a comparable-worth analysis before setting 1992 salaries this morning.

Colbert said two commissioners have agreed to discuss soliciting input from department heads — she only hopes they'll get a chance to talk before a pay resolution is passed.

"If they agree, I think they should do it before setting salaries," Colbert said. "There is not much point afterwards."

The commissioners may have to postpone setting pay until this discussion has taken place, Colbert said.

The comparable-worth analysis, which was presented to the Commission in November, dropped Colbert's job ranking among other county department heads. According to salary-range recommendations cited in the report, Colbert's earnings placed her at the top of her range and indicated that she should receive only a 1-percent increase for 1992.

When the Commission discussed 1992 salaries last Thursday, it was painstaking in its efforts to stay within recommended salary ranges. Except for Colbert and the assistant district attorney for child support, Linda Graham, most county managers will receive raises of between 5 and 7 percent — that is, if commissioners decide to stick to their figures.

Only one position, museum curator, fell considerably below the comparable worth guidelines. Commissioner Wilton Thomas said the county would have to find the money somewhere to increase the curator's salary by the recommended 12.78 percent.

Going down the list of elected and appointed officials, the commissioners hesitated to set the clerk's salary increase at only 1 percent. Commissioner John Sjo said the committee's salary range recommendations were not binding.

Soldier charged in local slaying

Army sergeant will be tried under military code

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

A Fort Riley soldier has been charged with premeditated murder in the slaying of Phillis Geiger, whose body was found on the post Nov. 17.

Sgt. 1st Class Edward Fierro, Company E/1st Engineering Battalion, was placed in pre-trial confinement at Fort Riley's Installation Detention Facility Wednesday and charged Thursday.

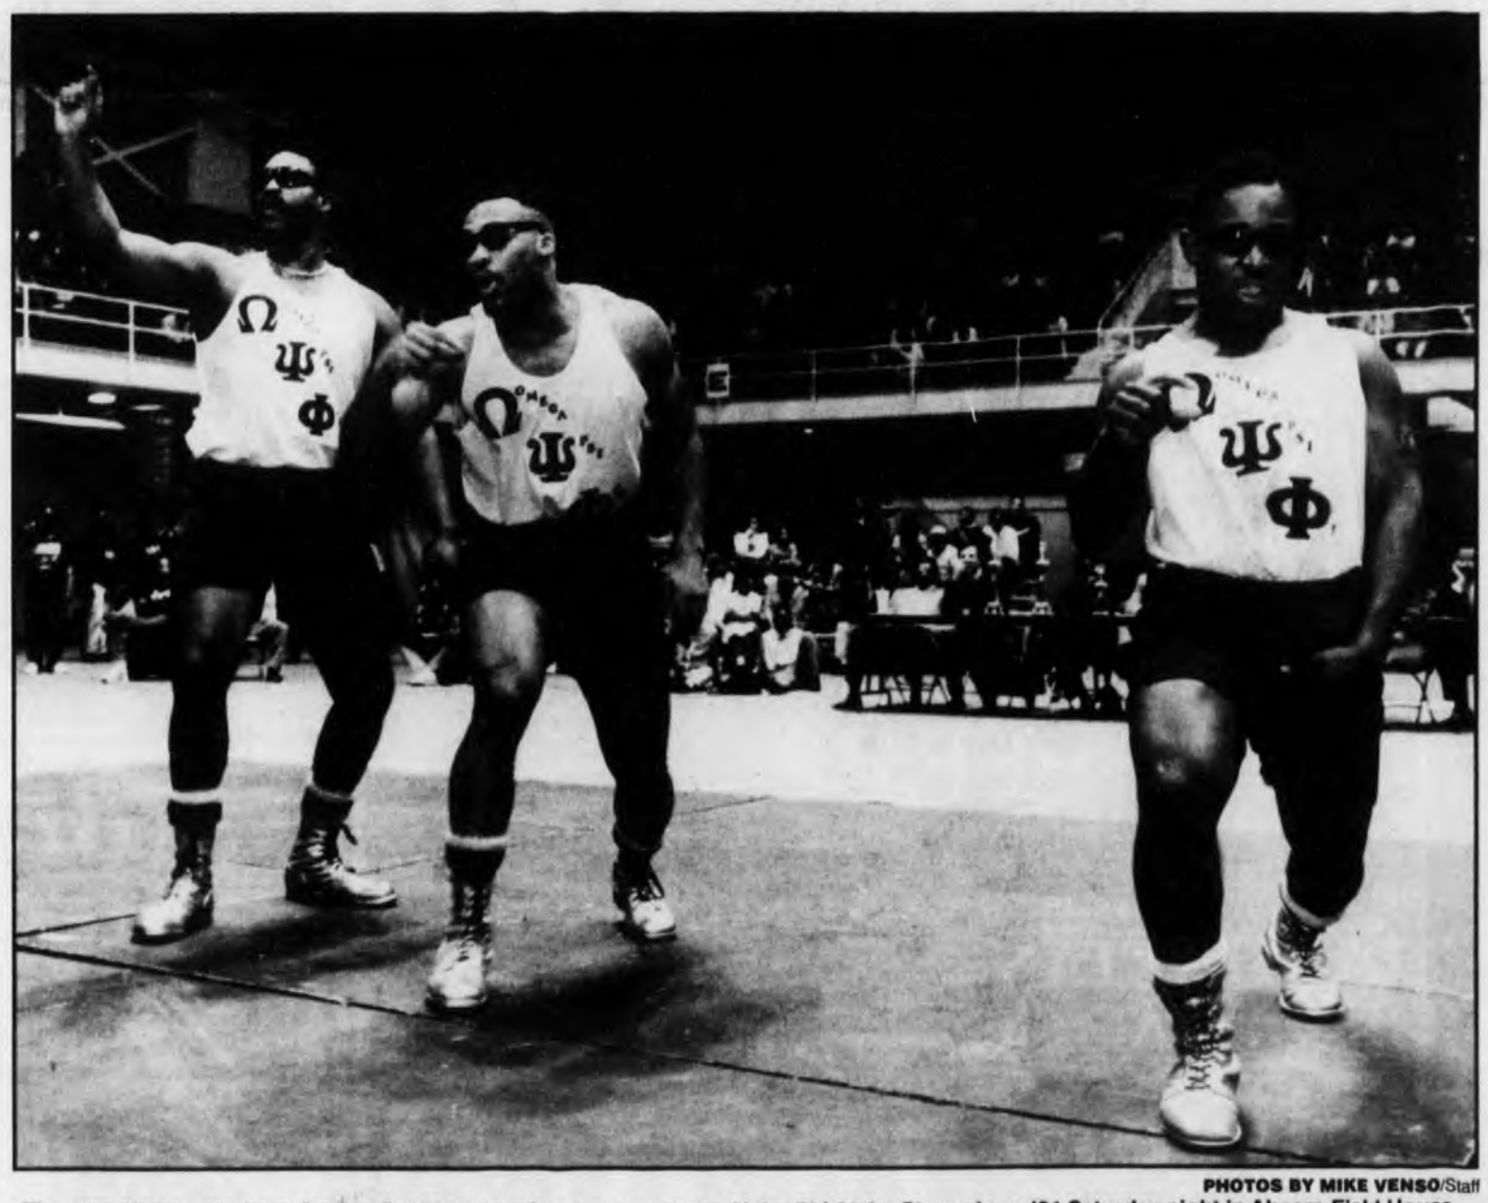
Another soldier is being questioned in connection with the slaying but has not been charged, Mark Meseke, Fort Riley's media relations officer said.

Meseke said Geiger, 19, was allegedly assaulted on the evening of Nov. 10 at Fierro's Junction City apartment and her body later brought to Fort Riley.

"We don't know the time of death or when she was brought to the fort," Meseke said. "We don't know if she was sexually assaulted. Maybe that will come out in the trial, or the lab may indicate that."

Meseke also said the exact cause of death is still unknown.

"There is some lab work left in the autopsy that will give more evidence as to the cause of death," he said. "She was apparently beaten. There were no gun or stab wounds, so apparently she was hit by a blunt object."



Meseke said interviews with acquaintances of Geiger led to Fierro's arrest and the questioning of the other soldier.

"I do know Fierro and Phillis Geiger were acquainted prior to the incident. It was someone she did know," Meseke said.

A relative of Geiger who wished to remain anonymous concurred.

Greeks compete in step show

Greek organizations from K-State and other Kansas schools got together Friday night at Ahearn Field House to compete in the Alpha Phi Alpha Stompdown '91.

Step shows are predominantly black greek events, where members of the same fraternity or sorority show creativity by presenting a timed routine. These routines involve a wide range of components including matching attire, props, different styles of music, stomping in unison and singing and chanting with loud voices.

Friday's show was the first organized step show at K-State since Black Student Union sponsored one during the 1990 spring semester.

Stompdown '91 gave members of Panhellenic and Interfraternity Councils a chance to participate too.

"We had the chance to stay in white fraternities as part of a brotherhood exchange last year," said Jerald Payne, vice-president of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity. "So, we thought we would show them what we do this year."

Payne said stepping takes a lot of practice. Everyone has to be in unison and on the same beat at the same time.

Three sororities from Panhellenic Council participated. Members of Alpha Phi Alpha helped them out before the competition by offering ideas for their routines.

Sigma Kappa to have house by fall '93

K-State's newest sorority won't have to use the Union as a meeting place for too much longer.

The Sigma Kappa chapter will have a house no later than fall 1993, according to their contract with the University.

Elizabeth Haynes, sophomore in geography and house manager, said that an architecture firm out of Kansas City has made the plans for the house.

"The plans are complete, all we need to do is get the money around to build the house," she said.

The cost to build the house is estimated at $1.1 million. This also includes the furnishings in the house.

"Money to build the house will come from donations mostly," Haynes said. "Although, we may have to use a developer or go to a bank."

The location of the new house is to be just south of the Sigma Sigma Sigma chapter. The house will accommodate 64 women.

Dari Basore, junior in finance and newly elected president, as of Dec. 11, 1991, said they were hoping the house would be finished by fall 1992.

"We're all really excited about it," she said.

The Sigma Kappas will be celebrating one year at K-State on Jan. 26, 1992.

Janet Scheibe, corporation board president for Zeta Tau, said that they hoped the house would be built by fall 1992, however, they don't know if that will be a reality.

Haynes said that everything looks great so far.

Edwards charged for abduction, rape

WICHITA, Kan. (AP) — Eight charges were filed against an Emporia, Kan., man in the sexual attack on a 92-year-old woman and her 63-year-old daughter.

Darron Edwards, 23, was charged in Sedgwick County Friday with several counts of aggravated kidnapping, rape, aggravated criminal sodomy, aggravated burglary, attempted rape and aggravated battery. He remained in jail in lieu of $500,000 bond.

The women were attacked Sept. 21 in their north Wichita home. They were bound, the younger woman was raped and both were beaten as they were being driven to Emporia, officials said.

The younger woman was raped twice more before the women were abandoned, police said.

Police said Friday that an acquaintance of Edwards was still under investigation for a possible role in the abduction.

When Judge Paul Clark asked Edwards where he lived, Edwards replied, "I just got out of prison." Edwards was paroled to a Wichita halfway house nine days before the women were assaulted.

Ethnic tensions increase in Moldavia

KISHINEV, U.S.S.R. (AP) — Moldavians went to the polls Sunday to elect a president amid mounting ethnic tensions in the mixed Romanian and Slavic republic.

Mircea Snegur, the former Communist who led Moldavia's independence drive after the failed hard-line coup in August, is running unopposed. He is widely expected to gain the needed majority of ballots cast by Moldavia's 2.4 million eligible voters.

Moldavia has declared independence from the Soviet Union, as have all the remaining republics except Russia and Kazakhstan.

Voting was brisk early Sunday at many of the 1,970 polling stations across the republic. But the mostly Slavic population of the separatist Trans-Dneister region in eastern Moldavia was expected to boycott the election.

The Moldavian Interior Ministry told the Tass news agency Sunday that Soviet military helicopters scattered thousands of leaflets in the Trans-Dneister region Saturday night urging voters to stay away from the polls.

Ministry officials have accused the Soviet army of taking sides with the separatists and arming extremists. The regional military commander has denied the charges.

On Saturday, two police officers were wounded when extremists armed with automatic rifles fired on a police car in the predominantly Slavic Trans-Dneister area, the Interior Ministry reported.

Trans-Dneister, with about a sixth of Moldavia's 4.3 million people, is populated mostly by Russians and Ukrainians.

The republic overall has a two-thirds majority of ethnic Romanians. Many of them want to unite with Romania, which controlled most of Moldavia until the Soviets annexed it in World War II.

Trans-Dneister separatists argue that their region, which was incorporated into Moldavia by Stalin, should revert to Ukraine.

Hunters challenge state laws

Physically disabled Manhattan men want statute changed

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

SHANE KEYSER/Staff

Hunting is difficult for the handicapped because Kansas laws designate electric wheelchairs as vehicles forbidden on public land. Tobie Tyler, Manhattan, is forced to hunt deer from a friend's truck.

Two area hunters are trying to change the Kansas laws that keep them away from public lands.

Tobie Tyler and Jim Auld, both of Manhattan, have two important things in common. They are both hunting fanatics, and they're also physically disabled.

Auld owns a special motorized cart, with similarities to an electric wheelchair, which allows him to be more mobile. His new mode of transportation has opened up new avenues of mobility for him, but Kansas law does not allow him to take it hunting on public lands.

Kansas law prohibits all motorized vehicles from entering public field areas. The law keeps hunters from shooting from out of the back of their pickup trucks. It also keeps electric wheelchairs out of the public fields.

To help influence lawmakers to change this statute, Tyler and Auld are distributing petitions.

Tyler recently moved to Manhattan from Wisconsin. There, he said, a person in a wheelchair, whether manual or electric, is defined as a pedestrian. In Kansas, electric wheelchairs are considered motorized vehicles. Because of this distinction, the only ways which handicapped hunters are allowed into the public fields are on foot or in a manual wheelchair.

Tyler said he tried hunting dove in his manual wheelchair but learned it was too limited in mobility compared to an electric wheelchair.

"We got about six feet into the field, and then I got stuck in the sand," Tyler said.

"Here I was facing and pointing my gun one way, and the dove flew off in the other direction."

Handicapped people in electric wheelchairs can hunt legally.

It is legal, for example, to go down the side of the road. Also, if a physician certifies a person physically handicapped, he may be eligible for a special permit to hunt deer with a crossbow. Auld said he obtained permission but later learned there were restrictions on the crossbow and arrow size.

Special permits are also available for the disabled to hunt, as long as the hunter is accompanied by someone who is not disabled.

Auld and Tyler said these laws are inconvenient for those who are handicapped, as well as those who are not.

Besides making hunting difficult, the Kansas laws prohibit people in electric wheelchairs from entering public land for sightseeing purposes. Signs that read, "authorized vehicles only," are posted at these areas, which cover about 10,000 acres of Kansas land.

"According to both state and federal statute, it's illegal to tell us we can't, when they tell others that they can," Auld said.

"I can get around," he said. "It's the laws themselves that are my handicap."

K-State 1 of 7 original land-grant institutions

Morrill Act of 1862 allows opportunity for higher education

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian Reporter

Editors note: This is the beginning of a four-part series on the future of K-State and of land-grant schools in general.

K-State became possible on July 2, 1862 when Abraham Lincoln signed the Morrill Land-Grant Act, of which Sen. Justin Morrill was the principal author.

K-STATE FUTURE

The University has been a land-grant institution since its founding in 1863. It was one of seven original land-grant institutions set up under the Morrill Land-Grant Act of 1862.

The act, which passed overwhelmingly in Congress, gave every state the opportunity to select 30,000 acres of public land for each member of Congress. The proceeds were applied to the teaching of agriculture, mechanical arts, and military tactics not excluding scientific and literary studies.

Morrill, a senator from Vermont, had three reasons for pushing his land-grant act.

First, Morrill said public lands were being dissipated by grants for many types of local and private objects. The land wasn't being put to use to benefit the nation as a whole.

Second, cheap public lands promoted bad farming, Morrill said. Farmers would use the land, exhaust its fertility, then move on, leaving it terribly eroded. If schools were established to teach agriculture, the people who farmed the land would know how to use the land properly, preventing it from being worn out and abandoned.

Finally, American democracy should give artisans a better chance, Morrill said. He wanted to see schools established that would teach the usefullness of mechanical arts, like engineering, to those people who de-

Regents to decide if KSU's draft mission statement will be permanent

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

It is now up to the Kansas Board of Regents to decide if K-State's mission statement draft will become permanent.

K-STATE FUTURE

The regents asked all the regents institutions to draft new mission statements. Dec. 1 was the deadline to turn in the statement proposals. The board will review them Dec. 19.

K-State administrators say the new statement's objective is to focus more on the future of the University and be less specific than the current statement, which was written by the regents in 1986.

"These will take each university into the 21st century," President Jon Wefald said.

All semester, suggestions had been culled from everyone in the University who wanted to contribute to the new mission statement. The Ad Hoc Executive Committee on Strategic Planning drew up the proposal using this input. In November, the draft was sent to all faculty, staff and student government leaders for review and final suggestions before going to the regents, Provost James Coffman said.

Other groups, such as the Council of Deans, the Faculty Senate Committee on University Planning and the College of Arts and Sciences' Faculty Caucus, submitted their own complete drafts of new statements to be considered in the final writing.

Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education, served on the rewrite committee. He said he thought the draft submitted to the regents im-

Choir delivers living greeting cards

Quartets sing at homes for $20; Performances raise funds for group

By the Collegian Staff

The K-State Choir is selling living Christmas cards to Manhattan residents, business, groups, parties of all sizes or anyone else who wants to be serenaded with Christmas carols.

Not all 72 members go out at once, however. The choir is divided into 16 groups of four, or quartets. A quartet will sing for $20, which has been the price for the past seven years, said Rod Walker, professor of music and director of the K-State Choir. Two quartets would cost $30.

"That's a reasonable amount of money for 'cheap' entertainment," Walker said. "And, the quartet will sing for about 15 to 20 minutes."

Amy Burgess, junior in music education and choir member, said the program runs from Dec. 2 to 15.

"We do at least one to two a day," she said. "During the last two weeks, we'll probably end up doing 30-50 performances."

The living Christmas card idea started about 10 years ago as a fundraiser. The choir uses the $600-$800 raised for music, equipment and travel expenses.

What was once a fund-raiser for the choir, is now tradition as well.

"It has really become a tradition for us. The kids enjoy it, and it is good for the choir. It gives them a camaraderie," Walker said. "We wouldn't do it if they didn't enjoy it," he said.

The selection of songs varies, but traditional Christmas songs and jingles are always included.

Sex — Communication, education key to adults', teens' future

Condoms are everywhere these days, and it looks like they're here to stay — even for teenagers.

There's a big one on the front of Newsweek magazine, and even K-State has a condom machine in one of its dorms.

Some high schools have opted, as part of its AIDS and sex education, to pass out condoms to whoever will take one.

Young people are claiming victory, because they say adults are finally taking them seriously and admitting that teen sex is a fact of life. But parents are outraged.

They say schools are going too far — that they should be able to control what and how their teens learn about sex in high schools.

Both sides have a point.

Young adults around the world have begged for attention and respect since the beginning of time. When struggling to survive that awkward slice of life between childhood and adulthood, teens just want to be treated as real people.

Everyone knows teens are having sex. That doesn't make it right, but it does make it real.

Instead of being condescending and scolding when it comes to sex, some adults are actually giving teens condoms and telling them about safe sex.

But, parents are saying when an adult educator hands a kid a condom, it's just like saying, "OK, now go out and have sex."

Whether passing out condoms to high-schoolers is right or not is debatable. The important issue is much deeper than that.

Dollar to a dime, the same parents who are ranting and raving about their dear children touching those nasty condoms are the ones who, at home, don't tell their teens about sex.

Overworked, underpaid teachers are asked to do far too much in the classroom today. Unfortunately, any teacher will tell you more and more of their time is taken up counseling kids and making up for parents who don't care or don't know how to.

Teen sex is real. Adults can help teens learn that it isn't always such a good idea by talking to them honestly. That's really all they want anyway.

And, while passing out condoms to keep teens from dying from AIDS may feel a little funny to the parents whose own parents never said a word to them about sex, it is necessary.

Sex is a matter of life and death now, for everyone who's having it.

Duke — Announcing candidacy sends GOP over edge

There he goes again.

David Duke scared the daylights out of the Republican Party once more when he threw his hat into the 1992 Presidential election ring last week.

After failing to win the Louisiana gubernatorial race to former Gov. Edwin Edwards, Duke will be trying his luck against two of the GOP's most respected individuals — flame-throwing Pat Buchanan and of course, George.

To the average person, Duke brings back memories of Lyndon LaRouche. In all history, only LaRouche could rival Duke in not knowing when to quit.

Duke's known by everyone for the white sheet he used to wear, and no matter what he says, he'll never be able to live down his roots in the Ku Klux Klan.

Still, if he had entered the Presidential race as an unknown without the checkered past, it makes the mind wonder what his chances would be. His stances are stereotypically Republican and his speaking ability rivals that of Jesse Jackson in fluidity and persuasion.

But that is not the case. Duke is not an innocent unknown. He is a dark horse with a dark past.

His entry has damaged the GOP's campaign immeasurably. He is hated and feared by his counterparts.

If David Duke so truly cares about the Republican Party, he will renounce his decision and step down.

Things you were probably wondering about

ED SKOOG

Columnist reveals stories behind big K-State stories

"Everything you know is wrong."
— Firesign Theater

With the fall semester quickly concluding, I probably ought to clear up some common campus misconceptions.

These misconceptions are dangerous things. A year ago, we believed our College of Architecture would be reorganized. However, President Jon Wefald never said that. He said the College of Architecture would be disorganized; thus all file cabinets, weekly planners and T-squares were to be removed by the end of the calendar year. Then, we pesky students rioted, and only at the last moment were Wefald and Provost James Coffman saved from the guillotine.

Now it can be told.

Another victim of misconception was K-State's former student body president, Todd Heitschmidt. The student perception: Mr. Heitschmidt took some dough-re-mi from somewhere in Holton Hall, drove to D.C., and haggled President Bush down to 25 Gs for all the furniture in the Oval Office, except the flag.

This conception was, of course, wrong. Mr. Heitschmidt actually paid for it all out of his own pocket, and the take was all the furniture from Vice President Dan Quayle's office, except for the wicker toy chest. Heitschmidt really wanted that toy chest, though.

It was also believed that the Collegian was run by Sicilians. I heard this from several sources. How silly. Collegian paychecks come from Swiss Illuminati.

Agriculture students don't believe the campus extends any farther south than Lafene Health Center and that Seaton, Denison and Holtz halls are just part of a rather large mural. Ceramics and poetry students have been informed that a wide expanse of land ranges north of Farrell Library, but none have dared explore it.

Another misconception is that the phrase "with regards to the aforementioned" means something.

SAGE, the association of English graduate students, has voted to go back to England, as the University structure possesses the misconception that good English is a disadvantage in business and daily life.

Those who live northwest of campus walk by a series of industrial scenes on their way to class. Most people pass the smokestack and steam-making machinery, believing that the huge contraptions aid in the heating and cooling of campus buildings, unaware that the smokestack is really a spaceship, manned by those people always running around campus with viewfinders and other supposed "surveying" utensils.

On the state level, misconceptions abound — primarily in the illusion that there is a state government. I'm from Topeka. I know. The capitol building between 10th and Eighth streets is actually a hologram. Kansas is governed not by Joan Finney, but by a blue-ribbon, quadralateral commission of the United States, France, Great Britain and the USSR, established after World War II.

Few Kansans realize that much of World War II was fought in the Flint Hills, and even fewer realize that Kansas has more coastline than Maine and Connecticut combined. The Kansas Coast Guard, centered in coastal Centralia, oversees some of the best natural harbors in the northern hemisphere and thousands of commercial and pleasure vessels.

In the Fort Riley Dock, several formidable fighting ships can be seen, and there is rumored to be a nuclear submarine base near Kingman.

While at home, celebrating whatever holiday your parents claim is holy, while sipping hot chocolate with your feet on a warm radiator, while you relax and watch another MTV Michael Jackson weekend, think about what you know and why you know it.

Remember this: The answer to all questions is "perhaps."

'No Rhodes for K-State' no good

Editor,

The article "No Rhodes for K-State; first time in 16 years," was one of the poorest that I have seen in four years.

I find it surprising that this was front-page material considering that winners of prestigious scholarships such as the Rhodes, Marshall, Fullbright and Truman are often relegated to page 3.

There were two factual errors in the huge headline. This is not the first time in 16 years that a K-State student has not won a Rhodes. In the last 16 years, K-State students have won in less than half of those years. Secondly, K-State has never won a Rhodes or any other top scholarship; its students have. No matter how much the media and the administration work to make scholarship success a source of campus pride, scholarships are recognition, but it is not the reason that anyone is here. We can all be proud that K-State provides an excellent education to its students and that this allows students to compete well on a nationwide basis for high honors. But no one, particularly the Collegian, has any right to bemoan a year with no Rhodes scholars.

The Rhodes and other scholarships are awarded or not awarded to people, not universities. The Collegian would do well to remember this.

Just Guys great idea

Editor,

I was overjoyed when I read the article "Just Guys able to talk openly" in the Dec. 4 Collegian. Indeed, the group Just Guys is an idea whose time has come. It is high time for men to lay all of their macho baggage aside and express their true feelings without having to fear embarrassment or ridicule. Men have always had the disadvantage of not being able to talk about the many difficult problems and dilemmas that face them.

We always hear women talk about how difficult it is to be a woman and how easy it is to be a man, but groups like Just Guys prove that men do have many problems that need to be addressed as well.

Campout eliminated for practical reasons

Editor,

In a recently published editorial concerning the Department of Intercollegiate Athletic's elimination of the basketball campout, the following points of reference were not included.

Students, through the fine arts/athletic fee, were allocated about 6,000 seats in Bramlage Coliseum; last season, there were only 4,003 student tickets sold. This, of course, became a concern of ours as we had some complaints from individuals and groups concerning the campout and the purpose of the campout. I believe the original campout concept was created because there was a larger demand for the tickets than there were tickets available.

The athletic department, with the assistance of the Student Seating Committee, then surveyed the student season basketball holders at the last three home basketball games. Four hundred ninety-three students said they would prefer to purchase season basketball tickets during fall registration, and 159 said they would not. Five hundred ninety-four students said they would be interested in buying football/basketball season tickets, and 40 students said they would not. Five hundred and nine students said they would prefer general admission, and 170 said they preferred reserved.

As you can see by these responses, the campout concept seems impractical.

Since the recent controversy and concerns about the campout have become so controversial, the athletic department hand delivered letters to all residence hall, fraternity and sorority presidents Nov. 20. This was the second hand-delivered letter to the students informing them of the date of the end of season ticket sales and asking them for a representative to serve on a committee to discuss the resurrection of the campout. At this point, 15 days later, I have had one student respond.

I believe if you visit with any student interns who work in the athletic department or close to it, you will find that the students' desires are definitely something we have a concern for and always will.

The athletic department is more than willing to visit and to get to work after the first of the year to resolve any confusion and to move forward with a plan for reinstating the campout.

Undecided students fret no more

Editor,

I am concerned that incoming freshmen with undeclared majors, as well as undecided upperclassmen, are becoming a problem at K-State. Only 32 percent of incoming K-State freshmen have declared a specific major, and only one of five students graduate with the major he or she originally chose.

I believe we could solve at least part of this student confusion by strongly recommending that students use the Discover program. Through this program, you fill out a small booklet about yourself and your specific goals and set up an appointment with a counselor. You receive a computer printout of a list of careers that will suit your interests along with job opportunities, the demand of that job, salaries, etc. The number to call is 532-6297. By experience, I feel this would be of great assistance to anyone undecided or unsure of a college major.

Queensryche surpasses others

Editor,

I would like to take this time to explain a few things to Heather Anderson about Queensryche. First and foremost, I was flabbergasted when I read her review of the concert in the Nov. 22 Collegian. She wrote a review which was unfair, untrue and obviously biased. Come on, Heather, this is real music, not Jane's Addiction or some other punk "college music" band. As a guitarist, I can assure you that Queensryche is one of the most talented and innovative bands in the world.

In reference to Scott Rockenfield's error before "Jet City Woman," all I have to say is "wrong, baby." I saw Queensryche at Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City last May, and they performed the beginning of the song exactly the same way. Let's face it, this band has been on the road for over a year now, and there is no way they would make such a mistake.

I have seen many elite bands in concert throughout the years, including Van Halen, Boston, Journey, Rush and The Who, and I can honestly say that Queensryche, in concert, far surpasses them all.

When I was in college, there was a reporter by the name of Alan Wilds that did a lot of college reviews. Since the day he graduated, I have yet to see a fair, unbiased review of a concert in Manhattan.

One last note to Jean Lebak, who also wrote in to the editor, thank you for voicing your opinion, but the nun in "Operation: Mindcrime" committed suicide. She was not murdered.

Proposal fails in delegate vote

Qualified admissions policy sent back to committee by ASK Policy Council

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

Associated Students of Kansas Policy Council delegates voted Saturday to send their qualified admissions policy statement back to committee after the group failed to reach a consensus as a whole.

Policy Council, consisting of student body presidents and ASK officers from the six regents schools, met Friday and Saturday in the K-State Union Big Eight room. Policy Council formulates the proposals ASK will lobby for during the legislative session.

ASK Chairman Todd Heitschmidt presented the task force's proposal which called for a mere limiting of admissions instead of restricting admissions as the Board of Regents has proposed.

As it stands, the regents' proposal requires an applicant have a 2.0 grade point average in a college preparatory curriculum, or score at least 23 on the ACT or be in the top one-third of his or her high school graduating class to be admitted to a regents university.

Heitschmidt said his task force agreed on parts of the regents' proposal but had strong convictions against other parts and therefore did not want to endorse it.

Task force members agreed the qualified admissions proposal would mean better prepared students would attend regents schools. They found, however, problems with the regents exceeding their jurisdiction because the board's proposal would affect secondary school curriculum across the state, which falls under the jurisdiction of the Kansas Board of Education.

To reach a compromise with the regents, the task force's proposal would mandate 15 hours of college preparatory classes for high school students. Students would have to maintain a 2.0 grade point average in those classes to be admitted to a regents school.

But, instead of not allowing non-qualifying students into the regents system, the task force proposed placing them into a remedial program that would track the student's work and tutor them in problem areas. If the student didn't improve after a semester in the remedial program, they would be put on probation.

Heitschmidt said although the board's goal is to avoid spending money on remedial programs by proposing qualified admissions, there would always be a need for the programs.

"We can't get away from remedial programs in our schools. Even Yale and Harvard have remedial programs," he said.

The task force said it was concerned that students from rural schools didn't have the opportunities as those from larger schools, such as the foreign languages curriculum.

Heitschmidt said the regents need to work through the Board of Education to avoid overstepping their ju-

Hotel rates vary with the season

Special events at K-State often cause increases

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

Those planning on getting a hotel room for graduation or a game weekend will need to make reservations farther ahead of time than usual and pay a few extra dollars.

The price for a hotel room varies a great deal. The thing that determines the rise and fall of rates the most are the seasons and special events, such as K-State graduation.

Becky Blake, director of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce conventions and visitors bureau, said the price really depends on the event and time of year.

"It really comes down to the theory of supply and demand," she said.

"We enter events, like parents' weekend, into our computer and because they are special, the rates increase by $6," said John Peterson, general manager at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome.

"People don't complain much because it's a different market, they don't know the regular rates," he said.

The normal rate for a double room at the Holidome is $67. For special events it is $73. The hotel has 200 rooms and is almost always at full occupancy for special events.

Peterson said since the hotel doesn't have a high season or a low season and the demand is so high for special events, it makes it easy to raise the rates in order to make up the difference.

"We also fill surrounding areas up like Salina, Abilene and Topeka, during special events," he said.

Ken Komenda, general manager at Best Western Continental Inn and graduate student in hotel and restaurant management, said the rates range from $38 to $48 and remain the same, even for special events.

"We're more prone to have the rates go down. We have a set policy and Best Western wouldn't allow for us to raise it above normal," he said.

Concerns lead to appointment

K-State forester receives position on national council

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

As an Extension forester for the state and as part of Extension forestry at K-State, John Strickler has his share of concerns about the environment.

These concerns recently led him to be selected for the National Environmental Education Advisory Council. The council works directly with the Environmental Protection Agency to promote educational literacy and implement educational legislation.

Strickler said the position will keep him busy, but he is glad to have been appointed, because he wants to help spread a new attitude about environmentalism.

"Solutions to environmental problems are complex, so we need to teach more creative thinking," he said. "It would be convenient if we could just tell the natives to stop cutting down the rain forests. But those people need a place to live, and that is the only way of survival they know."

The council was set up by the EPA in response to the National Environmental Education Act of 1990, which calls for the EPA to be the lead organization in approval of educational legislation. Members of the council represent primary and secondary education, colleges and universities, not-for-profit organizations, state education and natural resource agencies and businesses.

Strickler serves as one of the state education representatives.

As a member of the council, Strickler will help oversee the operation of a $1.7-million grant program, which will be used to develop an environmental education training center. Council members will make recommendations about who should be the recipient of the grant. The grant will be used to develop teacher training programs and data bases for the center.

Rowena Michaels, public affairs office director for the EPA's Kansas City division, said Strickler's appointment to the education division is a positive step toward environmental understanding.

"We are very pleased to have John (Strickler) on board, with his depth of experience in education and administration," Michaels said.

Altman's promise not a lie

Now's the time for a test, a real test.

The Wildcat men's basketball team has moved out to its first 3-0 start since the Elite Eight season of 1987-88 with a trio of home victories.

And nationally ranked Arkansas will invade Bramlage Coliseum Tuesday, smarting from a defeat at home to Missouri Saturday. The Razorbacks are 4-2, having also lost to Michigan State in the Maui Classic preseason tourney.

But enough about the foe. The team of interest in these parts is Coach Dana Altman's Wildcat club.

Though no one can really draw concrete conclusions of any sort through just three regular season games and a pair of exhibition tilts, a few things are readily apparent when one looks at the team Altman has assembled here.

The first is that there are several good athletes in this mix.

Unlike the teams of the Lon Kruger era, which had two or three thoroughbreds, tops, the 1991-92 team appears to have several athletes capable of exciting you with their athleticism.

Watch Trasel Rone pull up for a 3-pointer on one play, only to ram home a lefthanded, tomahawk jam on the next trip down the floor. Watch Brian Henson put in a reverse layup. Watch Gaylon Nickerson or Vincent Jackson pick an opposing guard's pocket, dashing the length of the floor to convert on the other end.

And watch Altman do his best to keep from smiling as he views the beast he's built.

Another thing that's plenty obvious to the trained eye — or untrained, for that matter — is that this team has a few more candidates to step up and win a game down the stretch than did last year's unit.

In fact, with Nickerson, Jackson, Rone and Ski Jones, K-State has at least four go-to guys that could send Altman home at night in anticipation of pleasant dreams of late-game wins.

After last year's last-place nightmare, Altman's due a few good ones.

Finally, it's plenty obvious that this group — and its style of play, in particular — is a great departure from what those in these parts are used to viewing.

Altman professed from the day he got the job after Kruger's departure that this eventually would be a team that played basketball like a 1990s team should.

This would be a team that pressed on defense, that had a transition offense, that had several athletic players who could beat you in several different ways.

It took him a transition year, but he's apparently about to deliver on his promise.

And the players are believing in the message Altman is sending.

But so much for the look at this club through rose-colored glasses.

This team is also capable of looking very ugly. You need look no further than a lethargic win over Missouri-Rolla a week ago for evidence.

In fact, this team is very similar to the Oklahoma teams K-State has made a habit of knocking off in that respect.

Athletic, to be sure. Consistent, not yet.

Darryl King, who watched his brother Stacey's best OU clubs keep K-State from Big Eight titles and further national glory in the late 1980s, thinks this group of athletes is strikingly similar to those assembled at Oklahoma.

This team is still learning to play together, and there are a few more free spirits here than at any time previous.

But you can take this one to the bank. This team will make the NCAA tourney this year and will surprise a few folks in the process. But it's a team a year away from producing the magic of the 1987-88 team.

Cats destroy Delaware State

Records tumble in 115-54 victory over Hornets

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

On the 50th anniversary of Japan's bombing of Pearl Harbor, the K-State men's basketball team did a little bombing of its own Saturday night.

The result was a record-setting 115-54 thrashing of an emotionally spent Delaware State team in Bramlage Coliseum.

Several school and Bramlage records were set or tied in the contest, a contest that the Cats, now 3-0, dominated from start to finish.

"This team has more weapons than any other team we'll face," said Hornet Coach Jeff Jones of K-State. "They are very smart and unselfish with the ball."

That unselfishness — to the tune of 32 assists, tying a K-State single-game best — led to a school record for points scored in a single game and another for margin of victory.

"I really like the 32 assists," Wildcat coach Dana Altman said, looking at the box score in his post-game press conference. "That means we were pushing the ball and popping it around pretty good."

As a result, this was a K-State team that clicked on a few more cylinders than had the same Wildcat unit in a lethargic effort Monday night in a win over Missouri-Rolla. Altman admitted as much.

"We were much more intense and were focused much better than we were last Monday night," Altman said. "It's a credit to the players. They really turned it up a notch tonight."

Possibly zeroed in best was Trasel Rone, who came off the bench to score a game-high 25 points. Rone hit a Bramlage record-tying six 3-pointers, including three in a row in a span of 1:15 at the end of the first half.

It was the hot shooting of Rone and other Cats that left Jones, a former assistant at Wichita State, scratching his head following the contest.

"I had no idea K-State would shoot the ball this well," he said. "They have great athletes."

Indeed, this was not just the Trasel Rone Show. The community college transfer was joined in double figures by four teammates.

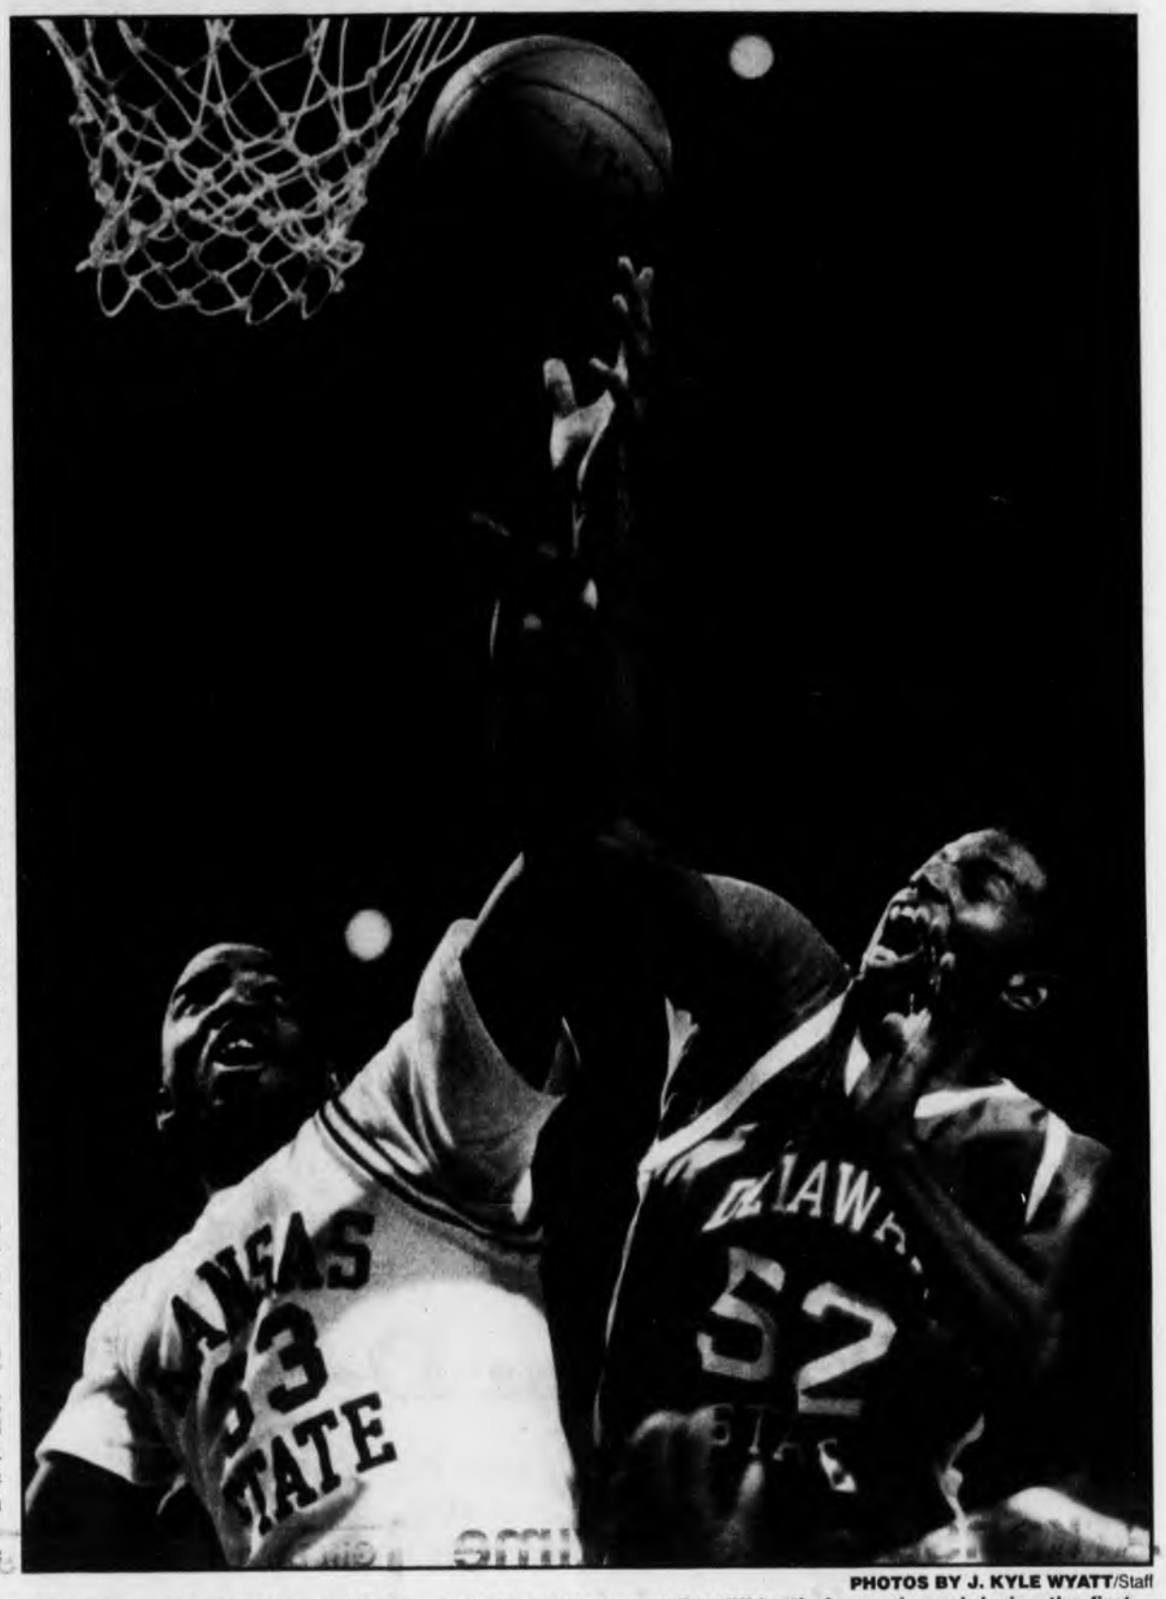
Ski Jones hit on 7-of-10 shots from the floor en route to 19 points in just 19 minutes. Joining Jones in the "point-a-minute club" was Brian Henson, who tallied 14 points in 14 minutes, including the final, record-setting bucket on a lay-up with just 15 ticks left.

Henson's lay-in followed a steal, his fourth of the night.

Joining Rone, Jones and Henson in lighting it up were Gaylon Nickerson, who fired in 16 points, including 14 in the 62-point first half, and Wylie Howard, who came to life in the second 20 minutes to finish with 13 points after scoring just two in the initial stanza.

K-State's hot shooting followed a strong practice Friday. The efforts in practice Wednesday and Thursday weren't quite up to snuff, Altman said.

"Yesterday (Friday) was maybe as good a practice as we've had all year," Altman said. "Consistency is not a strong point for us at this time. It can be acquired if we prepare ourselves for practice every day."



But the Cats were plenty consistent this night. That made it all the more tough on Delaware State, 3-2, which was coming off a big win Thursday night.

"They had a big, emotional win Thursday night over their state rival," Altman said of the Hornets' besting of Delaware. "Before the game, I told Coach Grensing (Greg, a Wildcat assistant) that after that win, they were going to come in here flat or come in here pumped.

"I'm sure, emotionally, they were spent."

That was apparent from the open-

Rone finds his shot

Extra practice with coach, manager gets junior on track

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

K-State scored points so fast and so often against Delaware State that Trasel Rone couldn't remember his only 2-point basket of the game.

A high-flying, left-handed, rip-the-rim-down dunk does have a way of slipping the mind, doesn't it?

"Oh yeah, the dunk," Rone said. "I was kind of frantic to get a dunk. You've got to cherish those dunks."

K-State was tickled over what Rone did outside the 3-point arc in a 115-54 rout of the Hornets. The junior transfer came off the bench to score 25 points, including six 3-pointers.

All of it happened after Rone missed his last 11 shots in the Wildcats' previous game with Missouri-Rolla and his first three attempts against Delaware State.

The cure was found during plenty of extra shooting practice under the watchful eyes of Coach Dana Altman and Manager Erik Crane, the son of Rone's community college coach at Allen County, Neil Crane.

"I hadn't been bending my legs," Rone said. "Coach was showing me in the film that I was standing straight up. When I got bent down, it helped my release."

Once Rone found the touch, he used it to bury Delaware State. His first 3-pointer was followed by two more in a 1:15 span that gave K-State a 46-22 first-half lead. The fourth trey gave the Cats a 62-26 halftime lead.

Many of Rone's shots were uncontested by the weary Hornets, who are currently in a stretch of five games in nine days.

"I think they were there for me because of the way Marcus (Zeigler) and Skip (Gaylon Nickerson) were penetrating," Rone said. "And Coach told anybody that had the open shot to take it."

"He would just come down and spot up for three," Delaware State

Rone's long-range assault continued with two more 3-pointers in the second half, but it was his dunk that got the Bramlage Coliseum crowd buzzing. The Cats used a half-court trap to force a turnover and Rone ended up with the ball ahead of the coach Jeff Jones said. "Hell, they all did it. This team has more weapons than any other team we'll face."
pack.

What followed rated a "10" from teammate Ski Jones, who scored 13 of his 19 points in the first half to get the Cats off to a fast start.

"Me, Vincent (Jackson), Gaylon and Ski were all saying, 'We've got to get a dunk,'" Rone said. "When I finally got it, I was happy."

Another thing that pleased Rone was the way the Cats bounced back after their poor performance against Missouri-Rolla.

"We were more focused and more intense this week," Rone said. "That game told us that we have to come out ready to play against everybody."

Wildcat guard Trasel Rone goes up for a slam dunk against Delaware State. Rone finished the game with 25 points.

Lady Cats fade in tourney losses

Purdue, Miami roll past K-State after intermission

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

The weekend was a long one for the Lady Cats — at least a half too long.

K-State dropped the opening game of the Northern Illinois University/GTE Fastbreak Fest to 11th-ranked Purdue 75-52.

That was little surprise, though. The big news was the effort that K-State had in the contest as the Lady Cats set a school-record seven 3-pointers on 11 attempts.

Kelly Moylan was 3-for-5 from behind the arc to pace K-State with 15 points. Gretchen Bertrand was 2-for-3 from outside for 12 points and Mary Jo Miller, who scored 10 points, hit on both of her tries. Jennifer Grebing also added 10 points on the inside.

Coach Susan Yow was pleased in the losing cause.

"I thought we hustled hard all night," Yow said. "If we'd played with that effort on our other games, we would have come in here 3-0."

The hustle by the Lady Cats was illustrated by 11 steals — three by Miller, Moylan and Bertrand and two by Jaime White.

Purdue led 38-37 at halftime.

But K-State couldn't maintain the pace of the high-powered Boilermakers as Purdue outrebounded the Lady Cats 46-23, while shooting 51 percent from the field.

Meanwhile, K-State hit just 32.3 percent from the field.

"Purdue really outmanned us, particularly on the inside," Yow said. "We had difficulty stopping them inside."

K-State's fought to salvage the weekend during the consolation game of the tournament against Miami of Ohio.

At intermission, the hopes of doing that looked bright as the Lady Cats led 36-35.

Vlasic leads Chiefs to AFC playoff berth

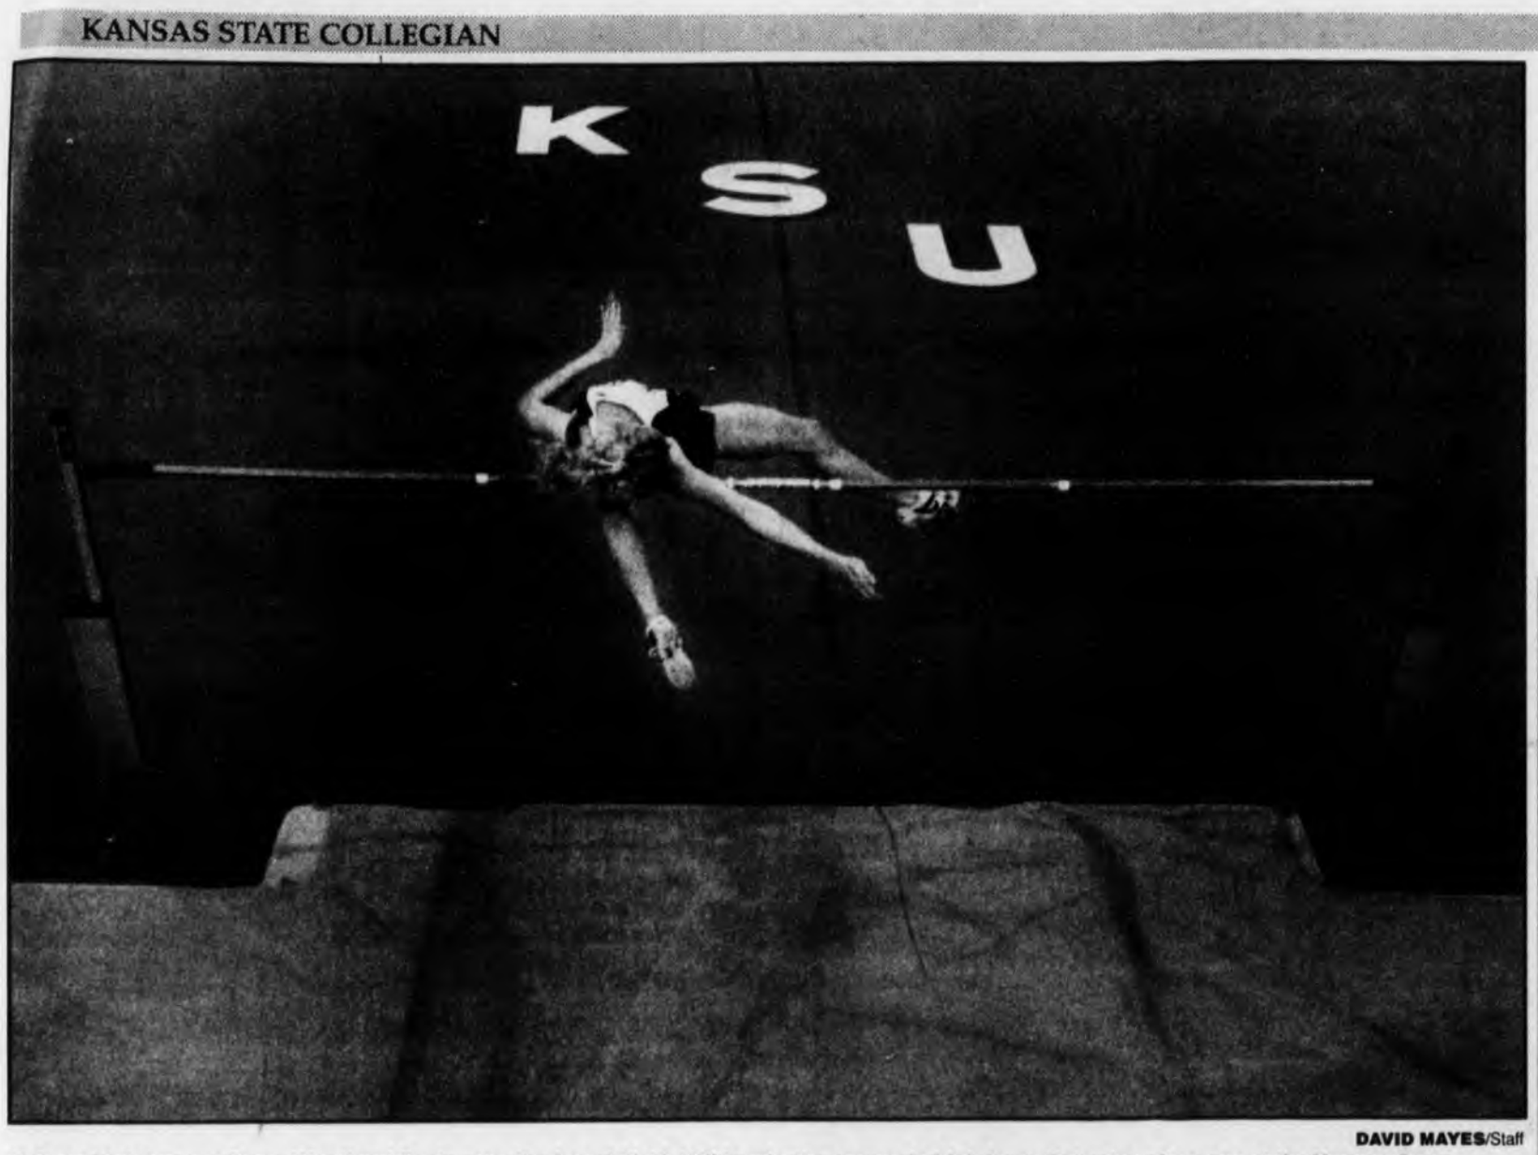
By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A victory that put Kansas City into the playoffs is what gave Mark Vlasic satisfaction, not the fact it came against a San Diego team that gave up on him.

"I have a lot of friends on that team. I didn't feel like I had anything to prove," said Vlasic, who replaced the interception-prone Steve DeBerg on Sunday and led Kansas City to a 20-17 overtime victory on the strength of Nick Lowery's 18-yard field goal.

The victory put the Chiefs (9-5) into the AFC playoffs. After the Chiefs' win, Detroit beat the New York Jets to guarantee Kansas City a berth.

Vlasic came to the Chiefs this year as a Plan B free agent after San Diego decided to go with John Friesz, who hit 19 of 37 for 208 yards and one touchdown as the Chargers (3-11) lost a 14-0 lead and tied a team record with 14 penalties.



"I thought it was a game that was disgracefully officiated," San Diego coach Dan Henning said. "There is supposed to be a 2-minute rule on replay and we had a 7-minute. There was a situation at the end of the first half that I still don't have an explanation of."

Long before Barry Word's 28-yard run to the 1-yard line set up Lowery's winner with 3:34 left in overtime, the Chiefs got what amounted to a gift touchdown on one of the more controversial calls of the year.

Dino Hackett came blowing in to throw Friesz for what first appeared to be a sack and a fumble, which Derrick Thomas picked up at the 1 and carried into the end zone. Officials on the field ruled it an incomplete forward pass.

But review officials, after a long delay, decided it had been a backward pass which hit guard Leo Goeas in the back and rolled to the 1.

"To overturn that, it's got to be conclusive," said Henning. "To take seven minutes, it's not conclusive."

Indoor meet serves as benchmark

Track team participates in lone fall event

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

The K-State track team got a good gauge as to where it stands after about one month of conditioning on Saturday at the Kansas State Allcomers meet in Ahearn Field House.

"I was really pleased with all the performances," assistant K-State track coach Cliff Rovelto said. "We had several people not compete, because we couldn't fit the events in. But I think everybody who came into the meet went away knowing that they did a good job."

Rovelto said the top performance came in the men's 55-meter dash. Thomas Randolph and J.J. Smith, who have worked out for only one week since finishing their duties on the K-State football team, finished first and third, respectively.

"Thomas just turned in a super time for this early in the season," Rovelto said of Randolph's time of 6.25 seconds in the event. "He's only been at it for one week, and to post that time is really good."

Smith finished the race with a time of 6.49.

In the men's events, Chris Tozier won the shot put with a throw of 49-5 3/4, and Mark Kimbro and Jason Meredith finished first and second in the long jump with respective jumps of 25-3 1/2 and 22-1. Corey King won the 400-meter dash with a time of 49.2, Richard Wooten was first in the high jump with a leap of 7-1, and Smith took first in the 200-meter dash with a time of 22.6.

"All the men did a really good job with performances," Rovelto said. "Especially J.J. He came out only about a week ago and what he did here is really a good sign."

Rovelto said that Wooten could have gone higher in the high jump but decided not to because of tendinitis.

"He was jumping really good Saturday, but it's the first meet of the year and we don't need to get anybody hurt," Rovelto said.

Christy Ward and Dione Singleton finished first and second in the women's shot put with puts of 46-4 3/4 and 44-2 3/4, respectively. Kathy Janike and DeDe Tribue finished first and second in the long jump with leaps of 18-3 3/4 and 17-10 3/4; Latricia Joyner earned first-place honors in the 55- and 200-meter races with times of 7.13 and 25.6.

Gwen Wentland won the high jump by clearing 5-10 1/2.

However, the Redskins thought differently as they came out in the second half and put a hurt on K-State, outscoring them 50-33 to capture an 85-69 victory.

K-State was led by Moylan, who scored 20 points. Miller, who suffered an ankle injury, and Leah Honeycutt were also in double figures.

In the effort, the Lady Cats tied the school record they established in the first game by hitting seven treys, this time in 16 attempts. Miller was 3-for-5, Moylan 3-for-6 and Bertrand 1-for-5.

ing tap, as K-State scored the game's first bucket — on a 17-footer by Nickerson to the left of the circle with just 30 seconds gone — and never trailed.

And as good as the Cats were, Delaware State's Jones isn't so sure they won't soon be better.

"K-State can't do anything but improve," he said. "They will be a force in the Big Eight."

If that is to be the case, the Cats will need defensive play much like they displayed Saturday night.

Arkansas needs time to be worth ranking

Day's suspension, Miller's weight holds Hogs back

By the Associated Press

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. — When Nolan Richardson spoke, nobody listened.

When the preseason poll came out, Arkansas was No. 3. Richardson, the Razorback coach, said thanks, but the ranking was based more on potential than reality. His team, he said, will be much better in January, February, even March.

Then Indiana lost and Arkansas was No. 2. Since then, the Razorbacks have lost to Michigan State in Hawaii and Missouri in Fayetteville and plummeted in the poll.

Now those who wouldn't listen to Richardson want to know why.

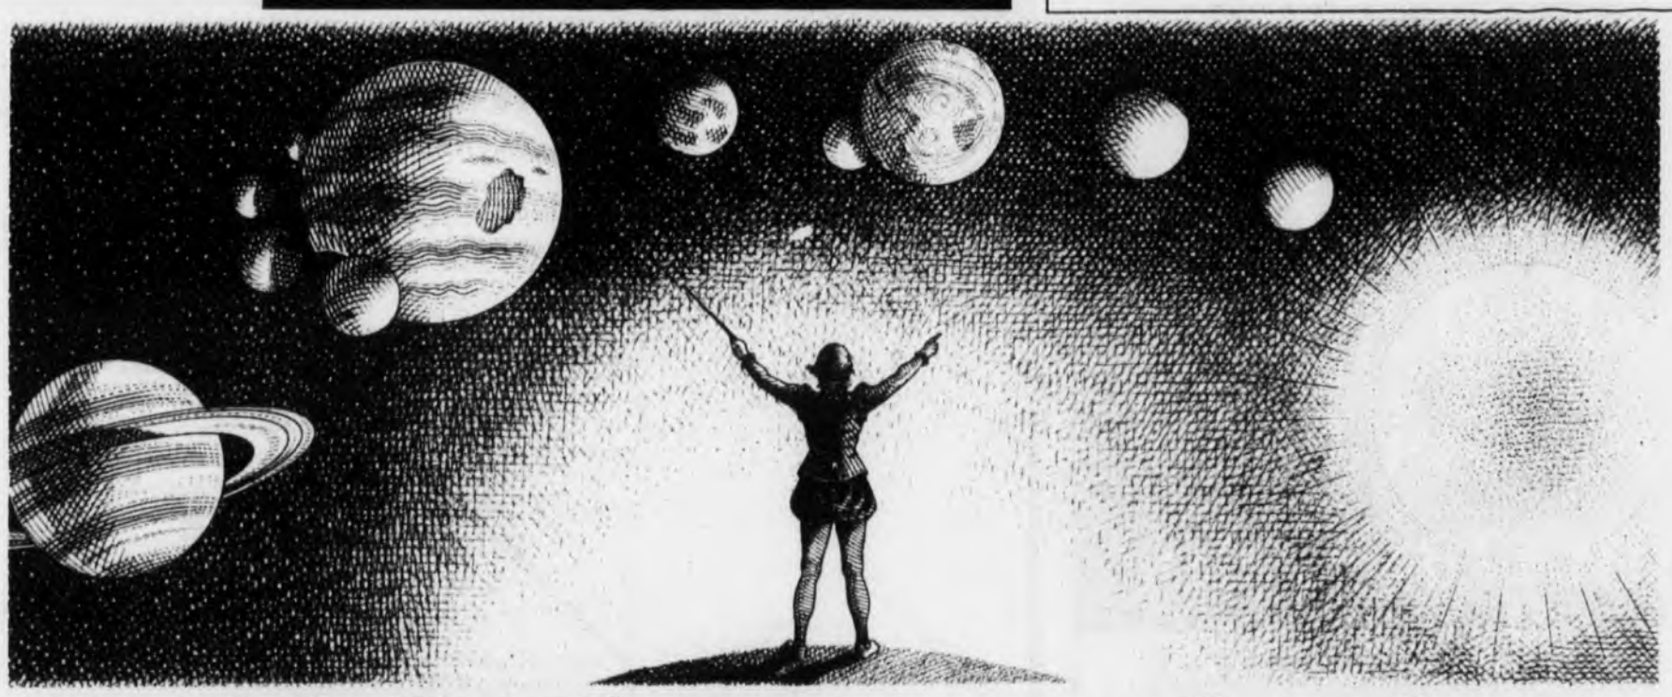
Richardson tried to tell them. He pointed out that Todd Day, who averaged almost 21 points per game last year, was on disciplinary suspension for the first semester. He also had a half-dozen other players suspended for a game or two and said it would take a while to get in sync.

"Because of the suspensions, we'll be patching a team together until January," he said before the season began.

"We're still searching," Richardson said Saturday night after an 11-point loss to Missouri. "In time we will have a good basketball team but we're not there yet.

"We're not the type of team we want to be. We'll struggle a little for a while. We're still searching for chemistry."

Arkansas started the season with a high ranking because Day, Lee Mayberry and Oliver Miller were returning from a 34-4 team that was one game from the Final Four. But Day is in coat and tie, and Miller is still fighting a weight problem.



And, Richardson may be missing Arlyn Bowers and Ron Huery more than even he thought. Those two seniors were a big part of last year's chemistry — Bowers, a tenacious, hard-nosed guard, and Huery, arguably the best sixth man in the country.

Robert Shepherd, who is starting in Bowers' spot, made three of 13 against Missouri. A half-dozen players off the bench contributed a total of 16 points — half of those by Warren Linn.

Residents offer free babysitting

J. KYLE WYATT/Staff

Smurthwaite House offered free babysitting for residents and students who wanted to go Christmas shopping Saturday without the children. Resident Rachel Smith, sophomore in engineering, swings around two-year-old Ian Stratton, Manhattan, outside the house.

Smurthwaite allows parents time to shop, relax

Abby was holding a Band-Aid™, but she didn't have a scratch. Mariel was coloring something, but she didn't know what it was going to be yet.

"I'm making rainbow fishies," four-year-old Parker said. "I can say my phone number."

Krystyna flew her freshly made kite, and Mike, a mature nine, impressed the younger kids with his professional looking glider — not to be confused, of course, with a paper airplane.

Several stared intently at the cartoon version of "Robin Hood" on the television, while an adventurous girl received the tickle treatment for climbing on the furniture.

The women of Smurthwaite babysat for free Saturday as a community service project allowing parents time to shop for Christmas presents or just take the day off.

Mardy Dickinson, sophomore in agricultural economics and Smurthwaite president, said the parents of 40 children took advantage of the service, making a lot of work for the Smurthwaite residents.

"Just being here with all these kids makes up for the hard work we put into it," Dickinson said.

Everyone in the house was involved with the project in some way, but Dickinson said 34 switched off in two-hour shifts Saturday.

"It's been a lot of fun, but it's been like a zoo around here," said Karma Brooks, freshman in arts and sciences undecided.

Nancy Fleming, sophomore in computer engineering, joked that she got a different message from the experience.

"It's a real deterrent for anyone to have kids," she said.

Residents distributed 100 posters to grocery and convenience stores around town, and parents called to make reservations for their kids.

The children could stay from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. for free, but Smurthwaite did accept donations for its philanthropy, Special Olympics.

Parents were asked to pack sack lunches, but Smurthwaite provided the luxuries, like 140 cookies.

risdiction. By placing students into the tracking and tutoring program, regents schools would be able to raise the students to a level adequate to succeed in school.

The University of Kansas delegation opposed the task force's proposal. KU's ASK Campus Director Joe Cinalli, said he felt the 2.0 grade point average was too low. He also said that because the majority of KU students come from urban areas, there wasn't as much a concern for students from rural schools entering college.

"We're saying no to the current proposal, but we're willing to work out a compromise," he said.

Cinalli said college-bound students won't get the education they need if all students are mandated to take college preparatory classes. He said the system will be bogged down by students who aren't interested in the classes or who don't plan to attend college.

Both KU and Fort Hays State University endorsed the board's qualified admissions proposal.

Emporia State University's ASK Campus Director Jennifer Hanlon said ESU wants the board to remain within it's jurisdiction.

"We want an emphasis on tracking and the probationary period because we're university students and that's where our jurisdiction lies," she said.

Jim Persinger, K-State's ASK campus director, said K-State agrees with tracking but feels the problem lies in secondary schools, and therefore, the regents should work with the Board of Education in making requirements. Pittsburg State University and Wichita State University also agreed.

"We should go to secondary education, that way we don't have to spend an extra amount on remedial programs," Shad Rockstad, Wichita State University's ASK campus director said.

Because of the lack of consensus among the schools, Policy Council moved the proposal back to committee.

In other business, the body voted to oppose the integration of Washburn University into the regents system if money would be taken from current regents schools to make the change.

Scott Brunner, ASK vice chairman and an ESU student, said the state's proposal not to increase Washburn tuition would inevitably hurt the regents schools.

"If tuition is frozen the fee-cost ratio would go down, but the extra money would have to come from somewhere — most likely through fee increases at the regional institutions," he said.

The leaders of the three Slavic states, who were to meet with Gorbachev in Moscow on Monday, pledged to keep central command over the armed forces and nuclear arms, to destroy atomic weapons under international supervision and to meet Kremlin commitments to the United Nations.

But Soviet media reports on the deal appeared to leave uncertain how the new commonwealth would live up to treaties signed recently by Gorbachev, such as an agreement with Washington to slash nuclear arsenals and with NATO to drastically reduce conventional armies.

In a separate agreement, the commonwealth would retain the ruble as a currency, although republics could issue their own money.

Libya tries citizens in Flight 103 bombing

Men hanged if guilty; government claims innocence

By the Associated Press

DAKAR, Senegal — Libya will try two men charged by U.S. and British authorities in the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 and will deliver the most severe punishment — death — if they are guilty, Libya's foreign minister said Sunday.

However, he said his government did not think the men were guilty.

Earlier, an official in Libya's Information Ministry said the two Libyans went on trial Sunday, but he likened the proceeding to an investigation rather than a trial.

The discrepancy could not be immediately clarified.

The two men, identified by the Americans and British as Libyan intelligence agents, have been charged with smuggling a bomb aboard the New York-bound jumbo jet. The plane was torn apart over Lockerbie, Scotland, on Dec. 20, 1988, and 270 people were killed.

London and Washington insist Libya admit responsibility, compensate families and surrender the suspects for trial in a U.S. or Scottish court. A spokeswoman for the British Foreign Office repeated that demand Sunday, saying a Libyan trial would not change Britain's stance.

Libya's leader, Moammar Gadhafi, denies his government was involved, and Foreign Minister Ibrahim al-Bishari repeated Sunday that his country would not hand the men over for trial. He said that would violate Libya's sovereignty and independence.

"Libyan judicial authorities will put them on trial," al-Bishari told Western reporters while in Senegal for a meeting of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

"If they are guilty they will be punished. If they are innocent they will be set free," he said.

He said the men would be hanged if convicted, but added that "we believe that our citizens are innocent."

He did not give a date for the trial of the men, Lamen Khalifa Fhima and Abdel-Basset Ali al-Megrahi.

In Tripoli, a Libyan Information Ministry official, Mohammed Ayan, said before al-Bishari spoke that the trial began Sunday. Although he insisted on calling the proceeding a trial, he said it was really more of an investigation.

"The trial began this morning and it will go on for some time," Ayan told the Rome bureau of the Associated Press in a telephone interview. He said Supreme Court Judge Ahmed Tatahar Zawai "is collecting evidence, listening to witnesses."

In London, a spokeswoman for the British Foreign Office said a Libyan trial would not cause Britain to retract the demand that the two suspects be handed over.

"In our view it is totally unacceptable for Libyan authorities to be judge, jury, prosecution and accused," she said, speaking on condition of anonymity in keeping with British government custom.

She said Libya also had not replied satisfactorily to the demands that it accept responsibility for the actions of its officials, disclose all information in the case and allow access to witnesses.

Allegations of Libyan involvement in the Lockerbie bombing and one of a French airliner over Africa in 1989 have prompted increasing pressure on Gadhafi from the United States, Britain and France.

Al-Bishari repeated his government's overtures for better relations with Britain and the United States.

"We want good relations with the two countries," he said. "Even old enemies can reach a solution. Why can't we do the same thing?"

Alluding to Washington's refusal to rule out a U.S. military attack on Libya if the North African nation does not meet the demands, al-Bishari said: "Violence does not solve problems and will kill the innocent. You cannot solve people's problems while you are killing."

He emphasized Libya's economic ties with Britain and the United States and said Libya had cared for the safety of 5,500 Britons and 2,000 Americans living in Libya and would not consider nationalizing five big U.S. oil companies operating in his country.

"We remember British help after World War II to liberate Libya (from Italian occupation) and to help us reach independence. We will never forget that," he said.

Icy sidewalks hazardous to students, cause falls

K-State immune from liability under Tort Claims Act

JANE ROESNER
Collegian Reporter

Snow and ice season has returned and with it comes icy sidewalks.

Cindy Burke, director of health education at Lafene Health Center, said specific numbers are not available on students treated after falls on the ice, but accidents do happen.

"It does happen frequently," Burke said. "Every winter, we have a lot of accidents related to falls on ice or slippery sidewalks. We treat a number of students with those types of injuries."

Richard Seaton, University attorney, said K-State has never had a lawsuit as a result of someone falling on a slick sidewalk. Under the Tort Claims Act, the University is immune from liability for any accidents on slippery walkways, as long as the ice and snow is the result of natural conditions.

Jerry Lane, director of facilities services, said the grounds crew consists of 30 people, and these people are often called upon to stay late or come in early to clear sidewalks.

Crews first clear the main walkways on campus, the sidewalks leading to primary entrances of campus buildings and those leading to the residence halls. Custodial staff is in charge of clearing steps and building entrances.

When complaints about icy walks are received, grounds maintenance crew members inspect the situation and try to take care of it as soon as possible, Lane said.

Kansas weather sometimes makes it hard to maintain clear sidewalks, because snow may melt during the day only to refreeze later, he said. A mixture of one part salt to nine parts sand is spread over particularly icy areas.

Lane said it was impossible to avoid using salt completely, and a low concentration is used. He said he realizes using any salt can be harmful to the environment, but a certain amount of an ice-melting product is necessary to help prevent accidents.

"We do as much as we can to provide a safe environment," he said. "There's a trade-off in everything, and having to use salt is a trade-off."

One sidewalk that particularly offers trouble is the sidewalk by King Hall, sometimes known as the pizza walk, Lane said. The sidewalk is made up of round pieces of precast concrete set in a bed of gravel.

Machines that are normally used to remove snow cannot be used on that sidewalk, because they would also remove the gravel, Lane said.

proved upon the old statement in its orientation toward the future, the University's international role and the relationship between instruction and research.

"Both in content and spirit, it matches well with what the people of Kansas expect K-State to be for them," Holen said.

Coffman said the board will not look for each university's mission statement to be the same. Each school will retain its individuality.

"You will be able to tell the institutions apart based on their mission statements," Coffman said.

Peace talks begin Tuesday

Israeli negotiators accept Arab proposal; procedural squabbles break out

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Israeli negotiators arriving here Sunday said they accept an Arab proposal to start peace talks Tuesday, but new procedural squabbles broke out over details.

Both sides told Assistant Secretary of State Edward Djerejian of their acceptance, and technical personnel were preparing State Department offices and conference rooms for a 10 a.m. Tuesday start, officials said.

But even as Israeli officials said they insisted on meeting with the Palestinian-Jordanian delegation in one room, the Arabs were demanding two separate rooms.

It was the latest in a string of seemingly petty wrangles clouding the historic talks, which began with great fanfare Oct. 30 in Madrid and were scheduled to continue at a lower level here last Wednesday.

Israel, however, didn't show up out of pique at the U.S. failure to consult fully on the date. Israel's negotiators arrived instead Sunday, greeted by several dozen Jewish and Christian supporters proffering flowers and song.

Across town, some 200 Arab Americans protested outside the Israeli Embassy against Israel's occupation of the predominantly Palestinian West Bank.

The Israelis said they were ready to start talks immediately but the Arabs refused, citing Monday as a day of mourning for hundreds killed in the four-year Palestinian uprising against Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Not to be outdone, Israel said it too had an observance Monday — the last day of the festival of Hanukkah, which marks a Jewish victory over Greek conquerors in the 2nd century B.C.

"We also have things to remember," said Eliakim Rubinstein, leader of the Israeli team for the talks with Palestinians and Jordanians. "But whoever wants to negotiate seriously will find

Uprising anniversary reason Palestinians object

By the Associated Press

HUSAN, Occupied West Bank — Four years into the Palestinian uprising in the occupied territories, residents of this hill village southwest of Jerusalem say the revolt forced Israel to accept peace talks.

"Without the intefadeh, nothing would have changed," said Saed Ahmad, a 35-year-old blacksmith, using the Arabic word for the uprising.

Israel denies being forced into anything. It says the talks came about because the Arabs, particularly Syria, finally agreed to direct negotiations.

Palestinian delegates said they did not want the next round of talks to begin Monday because it marks the fourth anniversary of the uprising. The Israelis, who had chosen the date, did not object.

The uprising began in a Gaza Strip refugee camp on Dec. 9, 1987, and it is "a very important and historic day for us," said Faisal Husseini, an adviser to the Palestinian negotiators.

In those four years, at least 872 Palestinians have been killed and more than 14,000 wounded by Israeli gunfire. More than 50,000 Palestinians have been jailed, and 8,300 remain in prison.

Israeli army statistics list 166,000 incidents of violence associated with the uprising.

At least 474 Palestinians have been killed by fellow Arabs, most of them as suspected collaborators. At least 75 Israelis have died in the violence, and the army says 4,960 Israelis have been wounded, both soldiers and civilians.

The uprising has caused economic hardship in the West Bank and Gaza.

Palestinian shops regularly open only half-days, and often shops and schools close all day to protest the occupation. Many Palestinians have lost their jobs in Israel.

Lately, many Israelis claim the uprising has run out of steam. Palestinians disagree.

Residents of Husan say they remain determined to shake off Israeli rule, sired to make a living in that area.

Land grant

Kansas and other public land states were adamantly against the Morrill Land-Grant Act because they feared their land would be controlled by outside interests.

The University of Nebraska, a land-grant institution, revised its mission statement about two years ago, Michael Mulinix, executive director of university relations at NU said.

"Our mission statement has three key points," Mulinix said. "First, it states that we are a land-grant institution. Second, we are a member of the Association of American Universities. Third, we are a comprehensive institution."

Bob Lowry, editor of the news bureau at Auburn University in Alabama, said that Auburn's mission statement has remained untouched since it became a land-grant institution.

"Auburn University was founded in 1856, but its land-grant status came later and since that time, the mission statement hasn't been changed," Lowry said.

Land-grant institutions originally were funded by the federal government and from private contributions. At times, the federal departments of agriculture, education, and war, which had close relationships with land-grant schools, were highly supportive of the schools. At other times, they weren't so supportive.

In 1890, the Morrill Act was amended to create land-grant colleges for African-Americans, so that blacks would also have access to public higher education.

There are 71 land-grant institutions out of the nearly 100 main state universities and colleges in the United States. Every state has at least one land-grant institution, while some have more.

"I know him. I've seen him. I know he went by Eddie," she said. "I went to the club with him, me and some friends, the same night we found out she was murdered — the night we identified her body."

The relative said Fierro, 39, did not act strangely that night. She also said she met Fierro through Geiger.

"Me and her met him the same night," she said. "I think it was in October."

The relative said she was shocked to find out that Fierro was charged with Geiger's murder.

"I just read it in the newspaper. I guess I'm mad in a way. It's not like I'm going to go and try to murder him. She's gone and killing him can't bring her back," she said.

The relative also said she did not know if Geiger dated Fierro.

"All I know is they was talking," she said. "She always said she was going out with her friends but never said who. She was secretive about her friends," she said.

The relative said she did not know anything about the other soldier who is being questioned.

Meseke said Fierro will be tried under the Uniform Code of Military Justice as part of an agreement with the Geary County Sheriff's office.

"Certain cases under the code are punishable by death. I don't know if that will happen in this case," he said. "The (Criminal Investigation Division) is continuing the investigation along with the Geary County Sheriff's office since the assault took place in Junction City.

"Hopefully, the lab work will give better clues to all the questions we have now. It will take a matter of weeks," he said. "It will be after that before anyone else is or is not charged and before a trial date is set."

serious people on the other side of the table."

The latest hitch concerned an Arab demand that Israel meet separately with Palestinians and Jordanians, although the two form a joint delegation.

Israel is willing to put the talks on two separate tracks but insists on initial talks with a joint team of equal Palestinian and Jordanian representation, Rubinstein said.

He said any change in that format, agreed on at Madrid, would require discussion.

"Consensus is the name of the game," he said.

Palestinians view that approach as Israel's way of denying their existence as a separate national entity entitled to an independent state.

"We have two separate parties and two separate nationalities within one framework," said Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi, adding that the joint framework with the Jordanians is designed mostly for coordinating purposes.

"Coordination does not mean melting everyone together," she said.

The Palestinians and Jordanians agree to have one representative on each other's 14-member panel. Israeli officials say they want more than one.

Secretary of State James Baker, interviewed Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation," said he wasn't surprised at the wrangling and expected to see more of it.

but acknowledge the revolt is running in a lower gear.

"As long as there is occupation, the intefadeh will continue," said Hani Salameh, 28, a leader among village activists. "I do not understand why people judge the intefadeh by how many stones are thrown at the Israeli army."

Husseini, the adviser to Palestinian negotiators, believes the uprising is changing but not ending. He sees the demonstrations during the Madrid peace conference, when Palestinian youths handed olive branches to Israeli soldiers, as being just as important as the stone-throwing of the past.

"The intefadeh is the movement of the Palestinian people toward addressing public opinion everywhere," he said. "The intefadeh is still going on."

Islamic fundamentalists — including members of Hamas, which means zeal in Arabic — want to increase the violence. They reject peace with Israel and want it and the occupied territories turned into an Islamic state.

Reyad, a 24-year-old Hamas activist in Husan, pointed across a valley to the neighboring Jewish settlement of Betar.

Commissioner Dick Jepsen said the commissioners should use the recommendations since they had requested the study.

"We'd be ridiculed if we don't follow it," Jepsen said.

Jepsen said that while it is customary for everyone to receive the same pay raise, the comparable-worth study indicated otherwise.

"To be legit, if we're going to use it as a guide for all the rest of them, we should use it as a guide for this one," Jepsen said.

The commissioners appointed a volunteer committee last November to examine the job descriptions of elected and top appointed managers and assess the comparable worth of these positions. Ironically, the study was requested after Colbert and County Treasurer Eileen King accused the commissioners of sexual discrimination when County Appraiser Sam Schmidt was given a $5,000 raise in July 1989. At the time, the three positions were in the same job category based on an earlier pay study.

According to a July 13, 1990 Manhattan Mercury article, the commissioners ignored the existing comparable-worth study because it was too old to be reliable.

The new study placed the county treasurer and the county appraiser in the same group, with 1034 and 1026 points respectively. The clerk's position was ranked considerably lower with 852 points.

To determine comparable worth, each county administrative position was evaluated and assigned points according to 13 compensable factors, including basic knowledge and experience, judgement, accuracy and physical surroundings.

U.S.S.R. dead, Yeltsin declares

Commonwealth 'illegal, dangerous,' Gorbachev says

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail Gorbachev on Monday challenged Boris Yeltsin's declaration that the Soviet Union was dead, branding a new Slavic commonwealth "illegal and dangerous" and urging the national Parliament to decide the country's future.

Gorbachev's statement late Monday put him clearly at odds with Yeltsin, Russia's president, who has already taken over much of the Soviet president's power and joined with the leaders of the Ukraine and Byelorussia in declaring the new commonwealth on Sunday.

The Soviet president has proposed to keep some role for the central government, while Yeltsin's commonwealth eliminates it — except for the military — and bans Soviet institutions.

Gorbachev's comment came several hours after Yeltsin met with the Soviet leader to discuss the "commonwealth of independent states" and said Gorbachev might have a role in the new grouping. Gorbachev, whose power has been rapidly evaporating since the failed August coup by Communist Party hard-liners, was not even informed of the plan until after Yeltsin told President Bush.

With his authority waning, Gorbachev lately has courted the non-Slavic republics and clearly had them in mind when he said: "The fate of the multi-national state (Soviet Union) cannot be decided by the will of the leaders of three republics.

Professor still has purple pride

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

Hermann Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering and ardent K-State fan, stands at the door of his predominantly purple office in Ward Hall. Donnert claims to be the "students' professor" because of the help he provides them — hence the name "Chaplain" on his door.

With one taste 31 years ago, Hermann Donnert was hooked on teaching

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Hermann Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering, is a dedicated K-State fan, and the purple carpet in his office is testimony.

In fact, with his "purple pride," it is safe to say he probably has more purple paraphernalia than K-State.

Donnert has been a professor at K-State for 25 years. His strict attendance policies have kept Paslay Lecture Hall in Durland Hall filled to the rafters, he said.

"In 1957, I immigrated to the U.S. on invitation of Uncle Sam," Donnert said. "There was a severe shortage of scientists and engineers. Somebody thought it was a good idea to round up some of Europe's top-notch scientists, and the offer I got was too damn good to refuse."

The U.S. paid for his trip with the stipulation he had to work for the government for two years, Donnert said. At the end of his two years, if he didn't want to stay, they would pay for his return trip to Austria.

He is a native of Innsbruck, Austria and has a Ph.D. in mathematics and physics. Donnert came to work for a research team at the U.S. Army Nuclear Defense Laboratory. In 1962 he was promoted to chief scientist for the defense laboratory.

Donnert said his most significant accomplishment was helping deter world war. With the Polaris, a newly-developed nuclear submarine warhead he had helped test, the U.S. was able to persuade Khrushchev to back down during the Cuban Missile Crisis, he said.

While working for the defense department in 1960, Donnert began teaching mathematics and physics at the University of Maryland.

"I got a taste of teaching and decided I really liked it," Donnert said.

An associate professor position Donnert wanted became available at K-State in 1966. Since purple is his favorite color, the school colors were just another positive aspect of the job.

Donnert said he likes lecturing, advising and helping students with their problems.

"I've sort of gotten a reputation of, if a student has a problem that's not too rare, to find a way to help the lad or lady," he said. "I had a student last year that referred students with problems to me. He said I was a chaplain."

Donnert said he can get things done by talking to the registrar, the dean of the graduate school and administrators. He said students can never get in far enough to talk to the right people like he can.

"If a student can give me a good sob story for no fault of the student's, I try to help them out," Donnert said.

One way he helps students with problems is hustling scholarships from outside sources, he said. Last year, Donnert helped gather $47,000 dollars in scholarships for engineering students. This put K-State with more scholars than any other school in the nation.

Elizabeth Sullivan, junior in nuclear engineering and a recipient of a past scholarship, said, "He helps students out a lot. If we need something, he helps us get it, especially nuc students."

Donnert's interest in students and

K-State formed to educate common people

Morrill Act brings education to masses, regent says

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

Editors note: This is the third in a series of stories about the future of K-State and of land-grant universities in general.

K-State's mission has changed from University president to president, but the basic goal of a comprehensive education remains.

K-STATE'S FUTURE

K-State was founded as a land-grant school in 1863 to educate the common people, Provost James Coffman said. Although mission statements are new to K-State, the basic land-grant mission is still there, he said.

"The heart and soul of the land-grant institution is to bring education to the people rather than just to those who could afford it," he said. "That goal is still desirable."

While K-State balances its fund almost equally between instruction, research and service, other Kansas schools focus mainly on instruction.

Don Hoyt, assistant provost for planning and evaluation services, said K-State's budget is distinctive from the other Kansas Board of Regents institutions because of its land-grant mission.

A large percentage of K-State's research expenditure goes toward the agriculture experiment station, while a large part of the public service expenditures goes toward cooperative extension.

Regents Chairman Jack Sampson said K-State is charged with the responsibility of relating to the agricultural and technical training needs of the state.

"Higher education had always been an elitist thing. The Morrill Act was to bring education to the masses," he said.

Because the nature of the family farm has changed, he said, K-State has had to change.

"We are now engaging in research for alternative forms of agriculture. As the biggest red meat producer (the state of Kansas), our responsibility is in red meat development," Sampson said.

The course of the University has depended to a large extent on who was president, University Historian

Engineering senior wins Marshall

$43,000 scholarship sends student to Cambridge to study soil contamination

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

Chris Baldwin, senior in chemical engineering, joined the ranks of K-State's national scholars Monday by winning the prestigious Marshall scholarship.

The scholarship, valued at more than $43,000, will send Baldwin to the university of his choice — Cambridge University in England — for two to three years of graduate study in soil contamination.

Baldwin was one of 150 applicants in the Midwest district. He and 20 others were chosen to interview at the British Consulate in Chicago, Nov. 21. Forty scholarships were awarded across the nation.

"We are delighted that Chris Baldwin has won this elite Marshall scholarship," President Jon Wefald said in a University press release. "'Academic champions' is not too strong a term to describe these highly motivated students."

Nancy Twiss, assistant to the provost for student scholars, said the scholarship was the equivalent of the Rhodes Scholarship in the academic world.

Great Britain established the scholarships in honor of the United States' Marshall Plan, which helped Europe rebuild after World War II.

Baldwin is the fourth K-Stater to win the award and will help the University maintain its ranking as first in the Big Eight for number of students winning the scholarship.

Baldwin was nominated by K-State for both the Marshall and Rhodes scholarships but withdrew from the Rhodes competition when he learned of his Marshall win before Thanksgiving.

Eagles find home at Tuttle

Water offers food during winter for about 20 birds living at reservoir

MICHELLE POULIN
Collegian Reporter

Tuttle Creek is playing host to our nation's symbol of freedom.

Each year, when the temperature becomes cold, bald eagles find their way to the lakes and rivers of Kansas to feed and mate.

"The eagles have been arriving since October," said Chuck Beaver of the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks. "Right now, there are about 20, and it will become more concentrated when Tuttle freezes."

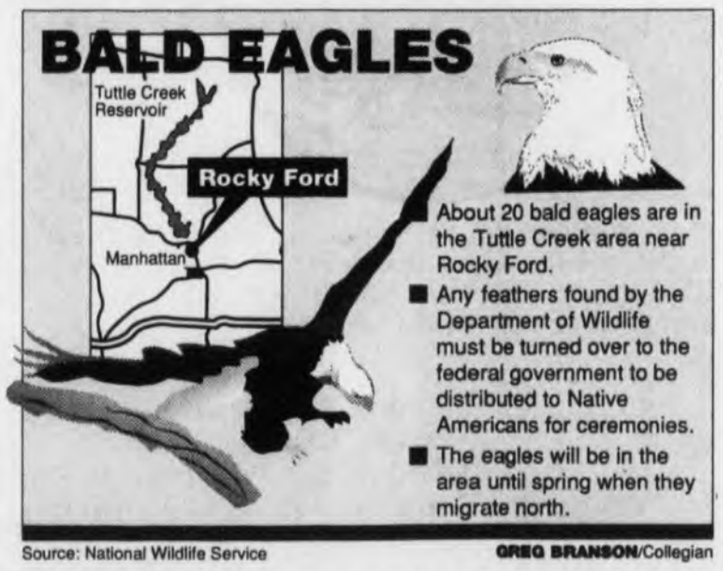
The eagles' diet consists of water fowl and fish. During the winter, many of the rivers and ponds in Kansas won't freeze, thus providing an excellent source for food.

"They congregate to open, flowing water," Beaver said. "They feed on the water fowl and sometimes the injured or sick fowl around areas that don't freeze."

Don Wixom, director of Sunset Zoological Park, said the eagles use the winter to mate.

"Right now, it is mating season for the bald eagles," Wixom said. "Because these birds are monogamous, they will go north in the spring to nest and raise their chicks."

The adult birds are detected by their white head and long, flat wingspan. The immature eagles resemble the Golden Eagle until they are about three years old, because they lack the white head and feet.



"If you go out to the Rocky Ford area and the River Pond area, you will see them sitting in trees or harassing ducks," Beaver said.

Both Beaver and Wixom agree these are beautiful birds to watch. They warn against getting too close to disturb the birds.

"The best way to see these eagles is with binoculars or a zoom lens on a camera," Wixom said.

The bald eagle is on the threatened animal list. It is illegal to shoot them, and a person cannot possess the bird or any part of it, including feathers. There is a severe fine involved if an eagle or any part of it is found on a person or in his home.

Wixom explained the government handles all matters dealing with the bird.

KSU logos boost scholarship funds

Revenue split between general, athletic aid

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

When purchasers acquire products bearing any K-State logos or insignia, they are doing more than showing purple pride.

The revenue generated by licensing logos and insignia for use on shirts, cups and other items is used for University scholarships.

The revenue is divided equally between the athletic scholarship fund and the general student scholarship fund in the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

John Fairman, assistant vice president of University relations, said the fee is an opportunity to develop more scholarship money.

He said the revenue from the licensing fee charged to manufacturers by the University totaled $66,000 last year.

That total ranked K-State 35th in revenue earned from its licensing fee in Division I schools last year.

"That's very good for the size of our alumni and our community," Fairman said.

K-State's revenue has shown growth every year since the University began charging the fee, he said, and K-State is one of only 20 schools that showed growth at the end of the last quarter, which ended in August. At the same time, he said, 50 schools are showing a decrease.

Fairman attributes several different factors to K-State's continual increase in revenue.

"The debate team, Rhodes scholars, Truman scholars — all these coupled with athletics has given K-State better public exposure," he said.

"Plus, purple has been a popular color in fashion, and that has helped us."

CORRECTION

In the Dec. 3 Collegian, it was incorrectly reported that 1991 is the first time in 16 years K-State hasn't had a Rhodes Scholar. The University had eight Rhodes scholars in the past 16 years and is in the top 1 percent of all public and private universities whose students have won the award.

ACLU forces removal of Nativity scene

HILL CITY (AP) — A Nativity scene was removed from the Graham County Courthouse because it violates the constitutional separation of religion and state, a Hays lawyer said.

Nevertheless, area residents are upset that the American Civil Liberties Union prompted local officials to move the creche to private property in Hill City.

"It's kind of disgusting that outsiders have to come up and cause trouble for your community," Bogue resident Liz VanLoenen said.

County commissioners met last week with Hays lawyer Gene Anderson and Dick Kurtenbach of Kansas City, who is regional director for the ACLU.

"If anyone's keeping them from putting up the creche, it's not the ACLU. It's the law of the land," Anderson said.

Commission Chairman Dee Swayne said the ACLU threatened to file a lawsuit if the county put the scene at the courthouse. He said the commission decided that it would be foolhardy to spend money to press the issue.

Kurtenbach said some things the ACLU does are not always gratifying.

"It's not a thing that ACLU does with any joy," Kurtenbach said. "One reason religion does so well in America is because of exactly what I pointed out, keeping the government out of it."

'Dead Wrong' prop lethal weapon

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — A handgun used as a prop in the play "Dead Wrong" fired a real bullet and wounded the director.

Kenneth Benton was accidentally shot through the armpit during a Sunday matinee performance at an Oklahoma City theater.

Benton was listed in good condition at Baptist Medical Center.

"It was a superficial wound, and he does not want to prosecute," Capt. Mike Roach of the Oklahoma City police said.

The script called for an actor to shoot at a mirror. The bullet then went through the set wall and hit Benton, who was off stage.

Benton and the actor firing the gun said they believed the .38-caliber handgun contained only blanks, Officer Jim Hale said.

Man shoots boy for ringing doorbell

BALTIMORE (AP) — A 13-year-old boy was shot to death after he and several friends angered a man by repeatedly ringing his father's doorbell, police said Monday.

William Brandon Jr., 49, shot Rubin Lawson after the youths rang the doorbell several times and taunted Brandon's father through the window, Detective Gary Dunnigan said. He was charged in a warrant with first-degree murder and was being sought.

"The kids were apparently messing with the old guy, and the son didn't like it too much," Dunnigan said.

Lawson was pronounced dead at the Maryland Shock Trauma Center.

Residents of the west Baltimore neighborhood said they heard children playing in the street just before gunshots rang out Sunday evening.

The shooting culminated a long-simmering dispute between the 68-year-old Brandon, who lives alone in the house, and neighborhood children.

"If he saw kids he would say 'get the hell off of my porch' all of the time," said one neighbor, Robert Blackwell. "He's an old man who everyone around here knows does not like children."

Egypt canal floods after heavy rains

ALEXANDRIA, Egypt (AP) — Heavy rains and malfunctioning pumps caused a drainage canal to overflow, flooding six villages and 6,000 acres of cultivated land in the Nile Delta with nearly two feet of water, an official said Monday.

The flooding near Edku, about 20 miles east of the Mediterranean city of Alexandria, was the second in the delta in less than a week.

Osman el-Kady, Edku city council chairman, said no casualties were reported among the 1,500 people in the stricken villages. No damage figures were given for losses to the fields of wheat, beans and clover.

The canal flows into Edku Lake, which in turn opens into the Mediterranean. El-Kady said gales along the coast whipped up surf that dumped water into the lake raising its level and causing drainage problems.

Witchcraft part of history education

Religion believes in reincarnation, karma

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Unlike the stereotypical image, a real witch might look just like the person sitting next to you in class.

Witchcraft or Wicca, "craft of the wise ones," is a pagan religion that was practiced in different forms in many parts of the world centuries before Christianity became the dominant religion of Western civilization.

"Wicca doesn't like to be included with the occult, but I do it for teaching purposes," said Robert Linder, professor of history who teaches a class on the history of the occult. "Most of what goes on in a Wicca coven is still unknown to outsiders."

Linder said Wicca is not as public as a Christian church service, because the members do not like outsiders intruding.

"There are secrets they want to keep," he said. "They are also a little leery because of what has happened to witches in the past."

Wiccan ideologies sometimes resemble Unitarian Christianity, but also include worshiping more than one deity and magick-oriented practices. Magick is the preferred spelling among Wiccans.

Wiccans are frequently and incorrectly associated with Satanists, although some Satanists call themselves witches, he said.

Satanists are by definition anti-Christian. Wicca, on the other hand, predates Christianity. They see themselves as an alternative to Christianity, much like Hinduism or Buddhism.

Many Wiccans share beliefs with these religions, namely a belief in reincarnation and the concept of karma, as well as a deep respect for the natural world.

"They certainly have a strong identification with Mother Nature, as we would call it," Linder said. "It's a very spiritual, earthy religion."

There is wide diversity in Wiccan beliefs from group to group, but there are some common threads.

Instead of one masculine god, Wiccans believe in a god and a goddess which go by a variety of names, or in one deity with both male and female traits. The goddess is usually the dominant deity and represents nature and the plant kingdom. The god represents the animal kingdom and fertility.

Because the animals early man hunted for food often had horns, the masculine god is depicted with horns. The horned god was associated with Satan by medieval witch hunters. Satan has since been depicted as having horns, a goatee and cloven hooves. Many of the misconceptions about witchcraft can be traced to medieval times, he said.

Wiccans can be either solitary practitioners or members of a coven.

"Witchcraft attracts some people, others are born into it," Linder said. "I have had students tell me their mother or grandmother who were witches were trying to get them to accept the craft."

Linder said witches like Kansas.

"Witches say that Kansas is a good place to work the craft," he said. "They like the western United States because there is less hindrance to communication with nature. It's less crowded, and they can be closer to nature and animals."

Linder said he knows about at least

Wiccan magick focuses on psychic energy, natural forces, not evil spirits

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Witches or Wiccans, the wise ones, don't make potions with eye of newt and bat wings, but they do practice herbal medicine.

Their magick is the concentration of psychic energy and the focusing of natural forces, not the conjuring of evil spirits.

"Wicca is a religion based on nature," said Kip Mussatt, senior in electrical engineering. He is a solitary Wicca practitioner.

Sometimes witches practice their craft in covens of up to 13. Other times they are independent or solitary practitioners.

"I don't believe there is a Satan," Mussatt said. "That's one big difference between Wicca and Christianity.

"A lot of religions say, 'There is this physical being that makes me do something bad, so it's not my fault — I was tempted.' In Wicca you say, 'That was bad. It was my fault, and I won't do it again.' You take responsibility for your own actions."

Mussat said Wiccans have a balanced theology.

"Christianity recognizes the masculine side of God," Mussat said. "We believe in the same basic things Christians do — that a supreme deity created the universe. We believe the deity has two facets, male and female, rather than just male.

"I can't speak for all Wiccans, but I believe it's the same basic god," Mussatt said. "I don't believe there is one true religion. What Buddhists believe is right, because that's the way they want to believe. For Hindu's, that's what they want to believe. That's the way they see the world, and it works for them."

Mussat places emphasis on nature.

"What it boils down to is that nature is divine," he said. "Basically everything revolves around it. We were created from the earth. We try to give back to it what we can. We see something bad happening to the earth — we try to fix it."

Wicca has two main rules, Mussatt said.

"All life is sacred, and don't do anything that would bring harm to anyone including yourself," he said.

Michelle Hill, freshman in hotel and restaurant management, is another solitary practitioner.

"I believe in a god and a goddess,"

Search starts for assistant provost

JULIE LONG
Collegian Reporter

An 11-member committee has been appointed by Provost James Coffman to conduct a nationwide search for a new assistant provost and director of the Office of Planning and Evaluation Services.

The new assistant provost will succeed Donald Hoyt who is retiring.

"I don't consider this a replacement, because you can't replace Don Hoyt," said Lynn Ewanow, assistant dean of architecture and design, and committee member.

Ewanow said the committee aims to screen applicants in early January. It will then select three to five candidates that committee members believe are the best qualified.

After they have selected candidates, the committee will meet with the provost. Each member of the committee will give a recommendation to the provost. Based on these recommendations, the provost will make the final decision.

The advertisement sent out to publicize the open position states the qualifications as follows: a terminal degree, significant accomplishments as a faculty member and administrator in a comprehensive research university, a thorough understanding of the operation of a large research university, significant involvement in institutional planning, skills in formulating policy options and recommendations, exceptional communication skills and an ability to work with diverse constituencies, a style which emphasizes the cooperative relationships and teamwork, and effective managerial skills.

"I'm looking for someone who understands the challenges of a first-rate university," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life and committee member.

Coffman expressed confidence in the committee and said he was looking for someone who is a good listener, has an even temper, works well with others and has a good sense of humor as well.

GAS UP — before prices go up

Listen up, kids. It's time once again for that old Christmas tale, "The Grinch Who Raised Manhattan Gas Prices."

It's a perennial favorite. In fact, it's so much of a Christmas tradition in these parts that people go out, not to see lights, but to watch clerks raise the prices on the signs.

OK, maybe that's a slight exaggeration. But then, so is charging 5-10 cents more per gallon of gas than surrounding towns whenever the students of K-State get ready to take a vacation.

Attorney General Bob Stephan investigated once and found no evidence of collusion. The gas merchants in town say they're not doing anything illegal. Unfortunately, what's wrong isn't always illegal.

Gouging the students who support you the rest of the year at Christmas time is so wrong that Ebenezer Scrooge himself wouldn't have done it. Unfortunately, the scrooges in Manhattan seem to believe, "Screw 'em; they don't have any other choice."

But you do. Go out and fill your tank today before the holiday increase takes effect. Or, if you wait until prices are high, buy just enough to get to a town where you don't have to pawn everything you own to afford enough gas to get home.

And, above all else, don't expect the Manhattan gas merchants to keep prices low in the "spirit of the holidays." They had no visits from ghosts of past or future, and their hearts are two sizes too small.

Where are the bombs?

The Sunday agreement between Byelorussia, Ukraine and Russia forming a Slavic commonwealth seems to pull the plug on the Soviet Union, which has been artificially kept alive since the failure of the August coup.

For some die-hard cold warriors, it is the final victory of the long-struggle against the "Red Menace." For those still sensitive, it means a more dangerous world is born.

Certainly, no one wishes to see a continuation of the worst forms of Stalinism, but now, those in control of the nations have ridden to power on nationalist feelings previously bottled up under the Soviet regime.

The new nations inherit the elements of a military machine, which only a short time ago threatened the free world according to the Reagan-Bush vision thing. At the very least, it is a military machine possessing a nuclear arsenal equal in destructive power to its American counterpart.

Under Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's Union Treaty, control of the military was to be kept by a stripped-down central government under his control. The leaders of the three nations that comprise the Slavic commonwealth, including Russian President Boris Yeltsin, are promising the military will remain under central control.

Who commands this central authority and how will it require nations possessing nuclear weapons to give them up are unanswered questions.

Unanswered, but important.

In an effort to maintain the Soviet Union, Gorbachev has been warning of a Yugoslav-style civil war between the former Soviet republics. Until the August coup, Gorbachev was praised in Western media for his ability to accept and act on economic and political realities.

Perhaps he has regained his insight. If he has, the world has much to fear.

Nice hospitality

When the Central Missouri State University basketball team went to Lawrence to play the Jayhawks, team members probably did not expect to be robbed blind.

After the game, Central Missouri State coaches and players returned to their locker room to find that more than $14,000 in cash and property had been stolen.

How nice. The Central Missouri State team visits the University of Kansas, and thieves are allowed by Allen Field House security to take the valuables of these visitors right out from under their noses.

It's absurd that visiting team members should have to worry about leaving their belongings in the KU locker room. And it's a shame this theft ever occurred.

Those responsible for the theft are a disgrace to KU and the state of Kansas.

KU should take measures to prevent future incidents, whether it be beefing up the security at Allen Field House or punishing those responsible for this theft. Probably, it should be both.

lying in a field, waiting to learn

JASON HAMILTON

Columnist, friend share, compare thoughts on semester

In grade school, I had to write an essay at the end of every year explaining what exactly I had learned that year. The trouble was, I had never really learned anything — at least nothing my teachers wanted to hear about.

I got in the habit, though, of trying as New Year's Day approached to list everything useful or interesting I had learned the previous year. Saturday night, Suzie and I worked on our lists together.

We were lying in a field, waiting for aliens or leprechauns or something to come and make big circles in what was left of the wheat. It was Suzie's idea, of course. She actually believes those circles in British cornfields are mystical (After all, they're on the cover of the Led Zeppelin CD box set) and that they're due in Kansas any night now.

To pass the time, we started making our lists. My list and Suzie's list are very different.

I learned this semester that there are very few sane people around, and I'm not sure I'm one of them. Suzie learned there are very few "cosmically aware" people around, and I'm definitely not one of them.

I learned it really doesn't matter whether I'm actually a good columnist or not. Some of my more hideous columns got much more response than much better one's I had written, just because they were about things people believed strongly for or against.

Suzie learned that hanging around with me while I talk about Collegian stuff ranks right up there on the fun scale with open-heart surgery.

I learned everyone eventually gets rejected by someone they care about, and it was about time I learned to deal with it. I'm still working on how.

Suzie learned there are actually a few people in the world who aren't just trying to use her, and she is still working on how to deal with that.

I learned there is a much stronger "Christian" movement on campus than I had realized. I tend to be suspicious of such things, but the members of these groups always seem to be happy and upbeat. Nothing seems to get them down.

The thing that makes me wary, however, is that they seem to have lost what I consider to be one of the most important human qualities — curiosity. Maybe it's because they're brainwashed. Maybe it's because they have all the answers. I don't know.

Suzie learned Satanism isn't all orgies and sacrifices. When she found out she actually had to read the Bible, she quit.

I learned it is much easier to criticize other people's writing than to turn out good writing myself. Suzie learned it is easier to write good papers for her classes when she isn't stoned out of her mind.

I finally figured out that worrying about things I can't control will get me nowhere. Suzie, who doesn't want to go anywhere, learned to worry.

I learned that virtually no one really cares about important issues anymore, at least not here at K-State. Even the people who actually get involved in what they "care about" are mostly doing it for their resume or just to make themselves feel more important. Suzie learned there are actually things worth caring about.

I slowly realized you don't really have to know anything to convince people you're right — you just have to be quick and sincere.

Suzie learned she isn't always right, even when she knows everything there is to know about a subject. She learned to think things through more carefully.

Suzie learned there is a lot more going on in Manhattan than she knows about. She also learned there is a lot more going on in Manhattan than she wants to know about.

I learned that Manhattan is a very disturbed community. Not many people know what people outside of their own little group of acquaintances are like or what they are doing. Virtually nobody has a good picture of the whole community.

Tensions seem to be building up as groups become more defined and less tolerant. Not many people seem to see just how antagonistic and isolationist different groups in this town are becoming. Things seem to be getting tense, but no one seems to care.

I learned that Suzie learned a lot more than I did, or at least she learned more important things. She learned to be content lying in a field, waiting for space aliens that were probably going to be very, very late. I only learned that I have a lot more to learn.

Drunken driving

STEFFANY CARREL

Accidents remind columnist of dangers of driving drunk

I went to Lawrence one Saturday.

It was a last-minute kind of thing. One moment, I was ingeniously stocking the tape aisle at Varney's, and the next, I was speeding my way through the darkness to Lawrence Land.

I traveled with four other Manhattanites, each one of them with their own separate intents for the evening.

I had fun.

I heard some groovy tunes, I saw some old friends and I knew I wasn't responsible for getting us all home.

Nifty weekend, eh?

Whelp, a few other things happened that caught my attention. Hard.

We were on our way back to that oasis we call Manhattan. I was drowsing fitfully in the back of the snug Toyota we occupied dreaming the dreams that come at 4 o'clock in the morning.

I awoke abruptly. I didn't know why, but I was suddenly very awake. I stared blankly at the night highway stretching out before us, and then I put my head down.

A minute later, we swerved.

I looked up as we passed two cars shattered on the left. Mostly in the ditch, one of the cars still partially blocked the left lane. Three people were flagging us down.

We slowed to a stop, and two of us got out. I hesitated, then joined their nervous trot back to the accident.

It took us forever.

There was a woman, a man and a baby. We asked if everyone was OK. It seemed incredible that they were.

Then we asked what had happened. The woman told us how she and her baby were just driving along when the other car came straight at them — head on. The man had been driving on the wrong side of the highway.

The wrong damn side of the highway.

And all he said was, "I got a bit turned around."

I will never forget that stupid excuse. I wanted to strangle him.

He's drunk, I thought. How could anyone drive down the wrong side of the highway and not be seriously intoxicated?

We made sure the people were OK and told them we'd get the police.

Those last miles to the nearest exit seemed to take years. I kept thinking how we had to hurry, because the woman's car was not clear of the road. I bleakly imagined them being hit a second time by some sleepy, unaware driver.

We finally got to the exit, and a friendly convenience store provided a telephone.

I called the highway patrol and reported the collision. They thanked me and click — my role was over.

It was just so weird. We all agreed it was a scene right out of a David Lynch movie. But it really affected me. I mean, I couldn't stop thinking about it.

What if those people hadn't been OK? What if we'd walked back to find two people or the baby in need of serious medical attention — or even worse, in need of a coroner? And perhaps most horrifying, what if he had hit us?

I assumed that since we had been the first to stop, that we had been the first car to pass since the accident. If it hadn't been for that woman, that man would've conceivably continued on down the highway until he was stopped by another car — ours.

It makes me sick.

One in 5,000 Americans will die in a car accident — many of those at the hands of drunken drivers.

It makes me seethe with anger to imagine some drunken bastard getting into his car and driving just because he doesn't have the balls to call a friend or take a cab.

Driving drunk is not cool, it's not safe, and anyone who does it should immediately self-destruct.

I'm not preaching or telling any of you how to live your lives. But allow me to say this: If any of you ever drive drunk, get into an serious accident and then die — you damn well deserve it.

Homer Socolofsky said. While the Morrill act aimed to educate the common people, it was a very general law, he said.

The act didn't exclude the liberal arts, as is often interpreted, he said. Instead, it combined agricultural with liberal studies. The first years were rough because there was little income from the state.

"Kansas was a western state with few with college educations, and there were few who could afford to go to college," he said.

Things weren't made any better when, under the leadership of President Joseph Denison (1863-1873), those who could attend the college took mostly pre-college classes, Socolofsky said.

K-State's second president, John Anderson (1873-1879), made things worse by throwing out all college-level classes and creating a vocational pattern. This significantly affected the University for the next 40 years, Socolofsky said, because students were enrolling without proper preparatory work. It made it tough on later presidents to implement a more comprehensive curriculum, he said.

George Fairchild, in 1879, became the first president to attempt to bring comprehensive education to K-State, but he found funding obstacles.

"He brought a slow re-introduction of college courses to the school, but the state still didn't have much money to implement them," Socolofsky said.

It was not until President Thomas Will (1897-1899) that the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Agriculture, Engineering and Human Ecology were established. Prior to Will there was no well-established curriculum, Socolofsky said.

"During this time there was a fight going on in the state on whether the college would be only an agricultural and mechanical arts school," he said.

The University of Kansas wanted K-State to remain an agriculture school instead of having liberal arts as part of its curriculum, he said. KU had an advantage, because many of the state legislators were KU alumni.

"Most people who went to K-State were blue-collar workers and farmers," he said.

President Francis Farrell (1925-1943) saw the change to Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science. Socolofsky said the change followed the trend of other land-grant institutions such as Michigan State and Iowa State universities.

During the presidency of Milton Eisenhower (1943-1950), a more comprehensive character of K-State developed.

Original mission to teach agriculture, military tactics

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian Reporter

Editors note: This is the final story in a four-part series about the future of K-State and of land-grant universities in general.

Through the college land-grant provisions of the Morrill Act of 1862, The Kansas State Agricultural College became the first state-supported institution of higher education in Kansas Feb. 16, 1863.

K-State may also have been the first land-grant college in the nation, because it was the first to formally and officially accept the provisions after President Lincoln signed the Morrill Act. Kansas received 90,000 acres of land through the act.

The original objective, or mission statement of K-State, was to create a college that would teach agriculture, the mechanical arts and military tactics, promoting the liberal and practical education of industrial classes.

At the same time, the Legislature created the Kansas Board of Regents to govern the newly established college. The regents were independent of state and government control when the board was first formed.

The Hatch Act of 1888 provided $15,000 annually to land-grant schools to conduct agricultural investigations and experiments. This set up off-campus agriculture experimental stations at the land-grant institutions.

Another act that affected K-State's mission was the Smith Lever Act of 1914, which set up the Cooperative Extension Service through K-State at different locations in Kansas.

Over the years, the mission statement has changed to meet the needs of the changing times.

Today's mission statement stresses teaching, research and extension.

"Originally, land-grant institutions were established to ensure the availability of college education to the working class," Provost James Coffman said. "Agriculture and the mechanical arts were the heart and soul of the nation in the late 19th century."

The revised draft of the mission statement has been presented to the regents, and Coffman said the board may consider it at its next meeting Dec. 19.

"The mission statement is a good statement of what K-State is all about," President Jon Wefald said. "It is an excellent reaffirmation of K-State in the past and present, and it is an excellent statement about the future."

There are 71 land-grant institutions out of nearly a hundred major state universities and colleges in the United States. Each has its own individual mission statement.

Activist to speak on human rights

Local Amnesty International chapter invites speaker to raise awareness

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

David Harper, member of the Board of Directors for the Kansas Coalition Against the Death Penalty, will speak at 7 p.m. Tuesday in K-State Union 204 in coordination with International Human Rights Day.

Harper, a former member of Amnesty International, was invited to speak by the K-State/Manhattan chapter of Amnesty International.

David Schmidt, faculty adviser of the local chapter, said International Human Rights Day was initiated by the United Nations Dec. 10, 1948. The day was established in conjunction with a declaration made by the U.N. about the way countries should treat their citizens, specifically prisoners.

Jeff Chan, senior in English and president of the local chapter, said the group plans various activities to raise awareness.

"The purpose of International Human Rights Day is to make people aware of basic human rights," Chan said.

Harper will speak about "Human Rights and the Death Penalty."

Schmidt said Harper is nationally known within the organization. Harper is a long-time human rights activist who has participated in campaigns in Florida and Texas for the abolition of the death penalty in those states.

According to a pamphlet distributed by the organization, Amnesty International is an independent, impartial movement which plays a role in the worldwide protection of human rights. The group focuses its activities on prisoners.

More than 150,000 people make up the 500 chapters in the United States. Amnesty International also has 3,200 volunteer groups in 55 countries and members in more than 160 countries and territories. Schmidt said the local chapter has about 170 members.

OTHER ALCOHOL-RELATED PROBLEMS
Women who do not abuse alcohol themselves can be affected by a family member's alcoholism or drinking problem or by being the victim of an alcohol-related offense. Many women endure stress or hardships in an attempt to cope with problems involving an alcohol-abusing parent, husband, or child.

Spikers' theme too true

Thank God it's over.

For many people on campus and in Manhattan, it is a relief that the volleyball season has come to an end. Even coach Patti Hagemeyer should be glad her first year at the helm is over, although she probably wouldn't admit it.

What else can be expected after half of the players who reported to practice this fall quit the team, and the team finished in a tie for last place in the Big Eight?

The sign above the Wildcats' locker room turned out to be a perfect theme for the 1991 season. Its message: "K-State volleyball: Love it or leave it!"

That short phrase implied it was either Hagemeyer's way or the highway — not an uncommon approach for a coach. What was odd was the number of players who, when confronted with the sign each day, decided to leave the program.

Sophomore Alison Murphy was the first of five players who quit because, she said, it would be best for the team. Murphy was followed by the Berkley sisters, Betsy and Melissa, and Letitia Melvin. Finally, walk-on Kara Murray walked off.

When reasons were given, the common phrase was "philosophical differences with the coach." Hagemeyer's common response was, "We wish them the best in their future pursuits."

But the players weren't the only ones who turned away from the program during Hagemeyer's inaugural season.

From game to game, the number of people attending the games decreased. Volleyball fans of the campus and community got tired of watching a team that really wasn't much fun. Five home wins — three of which came against low-caliber opponents UMKC and Chicago State — weren't enough to attract more fans and fill Ahearn Field House with noise.

The season opener against the Chicago State Cougars drew a respectable crowd of 642 fans. But the number of willing fans dwindled to 75 against Drake. Having been there, the person at the door obviously included the players of the two teams in the head count.

Even free admission for the remaining matches couldn't raise the number much.

Since there was hardly anybody to provide spirit for, Willie the Wildcat skipped most of the games, too.

The only groups that seemed to enjoy dealing with the program were K-State's opponents. Every Big Eight team that came to Manhattan left with a victory, and non-conference opponents Wichita State and Portland State enjoyed the same outcome.

Maybe they weren't the only ones who enjoyed the program.

Hagemeyer, assistant coach Sue Medley and those who remained on the team believed in what they were doing. Several times during the season Hagemeyer said her team was learning what it took to be competitive on the Big Eight level.

There are probably many people who disagree with that — ones whom Hagemeyer likely categorizes in a group that doesn't understand what is needed to be successful. But for the Cats to get up off the deck, the support of those who don't see eye to eye with the coach will be important.

What they want to see is a winning and exciting K-State volleyball team. Hagemeyer said after Murphy's departure that when a new coach arrives, growing pains follow.

Hopefully, that stage is over.

Another important factor will be if Hagemeyer will accept other's opinions in the future. Or will she continue with the attitude that she, and only she, knows what's best for the program?

If that's the case, Hagemeyer's idea of having everybody together in the same boat will probably fail.

Hurting Hogs still tough test

Arkansas struggling without Day; Altman says Cats must be prepared

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

When K-State men's basketball players, coaches and fans looked at the Wildcat schedule prior to the year, game No. 4 got the heart pounding faster, made the palms a bit sweatier and had the hairs standing on end.

And though Arkansas — the opponent in game No. 4 at 8 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum — has suffered two losses on the young season, there's still a keen sense of anticipation in these parts.

"The players have been looking to this game for a while, and the coaching staff has been, too," said K-State coach Dana Altman of the matchup between his Wildcats, 3-0, and the 19th-ranked Razorbacks, 4-2.

K-State is coming off of the most impressive win — statistically — in the storied history of the program. The Cats routed Delaware State 115-54 Saturday night in Bramlage, and the 61-point margin of victory was the largest ever for K-State.

Arkansas, on the other hand, is smarting from an 87-76 loss to Missouri Saturday night in Fayetteville, Ark.

The loss by the Razorbacks to the Tigers won't help K-State any, Altman said.

"Arkansas got stung last Saturday night, and they'll definitely be looking to bounce back," Altman said. "They're going to put up a good fight."

Leading that fight for Coach Nolan Richardson's squad will be four players currently scoring in double figures. Guard Lee Mayberry is the team's floor leader, and he's the Razorbacks' leading scorer as well, averaging 17.2 points an outing.

"Mayberry is such a great player who is capable of doing so much," Altman said of the Arkansas team leader in minutes played, assists and steals.

But K-State's greatest concern is the man in the middle of the Hogs' attack, 6-foot-9, 290-pound center Oliver Miller.

Miller had 23 points and 17 rebounds in Arkansas' season-opening win over Minnesota in the Maui Invitational. He also had 22 points and 16 rebounds in the meeting between Arkansas and K-State last season in Fayetteville.

"Right now, Oliver Miller is our No. 1 concern," said Altman, who indicated after Saturday's win that John Rettiger and Darryl King would play a big role in helping starter Wylie Howard attempt to shut down Miller. "Last year (in a 112-88 Razorback win), he got a lot of offensive rebounds and stuck them back in. He's also so difficult to match up because of his size.

"Right now, I'd have to say he's one of the top players in the country."

And players like Mayberry and Miller — even minus All-American Todd Day, who is serving a university-imposed suspension — make things tough night-in and night-out, Altman said. This is a team that will make steady improvement, the K-State coach warned.

"Missouri did a good job, and they did it in Barnhill, which is always a tough place to play," Altman said of the Razorbacks' defeat Saturday. "But Arkansas is going to get better.

"A good team improves every day. And this team will be better on Tuesday than it was on Saturday."

Altman's hope is that the Cats will be better as well.

"This is definitely a measuring point for us," he said. "This is our first major test of the season, and we will find out where we stand after this game."

Altman listed guard play as a strength through three games, but cautioned that a lack of consistency has him a bit concerned.

"Our guards have been playing really well to this point," Altman said. "But right now, we don't have that much consistency. We need to have that consistency if we are going to be a good team."

Dudes with Tubes' Anne Allison tries to score against PCT goalie Doug Oxley during the intramural inner-tube water polo finals Monday night in the Natatorium. Dudes with Tubes scored a goal in the final two minutes for a come-from-behind 10-9 victory.

Dudes with Tubes rally for victory

Inner tube championship goes down to wire

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

Fortunately for Dudes with Tubes, it doesn't matter how long a team leads a game. It's when you have the lead that counts.

Dudes with Tubes captured the championship of the Intramural Inner-Tube Water Polo Tournament with a 10-9 win over PCT Monday in the Natatorium. The winning goal by center Barry Kadel with 1:45 remaining was the first lead for the Dudes, but it was the one that clinched the crown.

PCT had to win the game to force Dudes with Tubes into a second title game in the double-elimination tournament. Dudes with Tubes advanced through the bracket without a loss.

It appeared early that a second game would be needed. PCT's Mark Eisenhart scored the first goal two minutes into the game. He added a penalty throw in the closing seconds of the opening period to give PCT a 3-1 lead.

The second period was dominated by both offenses, as eight goals were scored. Whenever Dudes with Tubes scored, PCT fought back with a goal of its own. With his second of seven goals, Kadel shortened PCT's lead to 7-4 at halftime.

Fatigue was evident in the third quarter, as both offensive lines moved the ball slower. Still, Dudes with Tubes used the period to cut PCT's lead to 8-6.

Then it was all Kadel.

With four goals thrown out of the backfield, Kadel led Dudes with Tubes in its comeback effort. With four minutes left in the match, Dudes with Tubes tied the game for the first time at 8. But PCT fought back and regained the lead a minute later.

With 2:20 remaining, Kadel forced the second tie of the game, and added the game-winner 45 seconds later. PCT had one last chance to score but failed.

Dudes with Tubes' team captain Darin Scheer said he was surprised with the outcome.

"I can't believe that we came back," Scheer said. "We were three goals behind but certainly played better defense to come back."

Scheer said Kadel was the star of the game.

"We put three players on the center position but scored only once," he said. "Then Barry jumped in and we started to throw in some good shots."

Kadel said it was the first time he had ever played the center position.

"Today we put both together, defense and offense," he said. "We beat this team before and I think that was one edge for us in our win. We knew we could win against them. We had the upper hand."

Both Kadel and Scheer agreed that PCT was the strongest team they played in the tournament.

"They were really good," Kadel said. "They were tough inside and they are physically the strongest and best team we have played."

Joyner joins Royals for a year

KC offers $4.2 million contract to Angels' free agent first baseman

By the Associated Press

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. — Wally's world is moving to the Midwest.

First baseman Wally Joyner decided to leave the California Angels Monday and signed a one-year, $4.2 million contract with the Kansas City Royals.

The Angels had offered Joyner a four-year deal for $15.75 million, but there were problems with the payout schedule, and the deal started to fall apart about a week ago.

"It's the toughest decision I've ever made," an emotional Joyner said. "I enjoyed my time with the Angels — that's where Wally's World started."

Joyner arrived on the scene in 1986 just down the road from Disneyland. He hit 22 homers with 100 RBIs as a rookie and became an instant fan favorite. The next season, he hit a career-high 34 homers and drove in 117 runs.

But his numbers tailed off after that, and he had some bitter arbitration battles with the Angels. Last season, Joyner made $2.1 million and hit .301 with 21 homers and 96 RBIs.

"I didn't see my future with the Angels," Joyner said while trying to hold off tears. "It has never been an issue of money. I have a lot of integrity."

Barry Axelrod, Joyner's agent, said he thought a deal was wrapped up with the Angels on two occasions only to have California try to change the language.

"There's been a lot of pressure that built up," Joyner, 29, said. "I apologize for making a scene. My record for the Angels speaks for itself."

In six seasons with California, Joyner compiled an average of .288 with 114 homers and 518 RBIs.

"One of our primary goals this offseason was to acquire another solid hitter who could can produce runs," Kansas City general manager Herk Robinson said. "We believe Joyner fills that role and will be a solid addition to our club. He has been very consistent throughout his career, and coming to Kansas City was his first choice."

Joyner's agent also talked to the Los Angeles Dodgers and the New York Yankees. The Royals will allow Joyner to become a free agent after the 1992 season, while Los Angeles was unwilling to include that in the contract. Joyner did not want to play in New York.

"I signed a one-year contract, so I could solve the problem immediately," Joyner said. "Kansas City is a great place to play. I would like to stay there as long as I can. The Kansas City Royals and I are a perfect fit."

The Angels acquired Von Hayes from Philadelphia on Sunday for two minor leaguers, and he may take over at first base for California. The Royals, meanwhile, facing the loss of free agent Danny Tartabull, aren't finished trading.

"We're still looking to help our offense," Robinson said. "We have some pitching we may be able to trade."

Angels general manager Whitey Herzog made an attempt Sunday to keep Joyner, but the damage already was done.

"My reaction this morning shows my frustration," Joyner said. "A one-year deal is fine with me with the possibility of free agency at the end of the season."

Club started small

Surowski's work helps table tennis gain in popularity

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

It's like sitting in one of his classes. You listen, and David Surowski, professor of mathematics, uses the blackboard and statistics to make it easier to explain.

TABLE TENNIS

Surowski isn't explaining the Pythagorean Theorem, though. Instead, he's talking about the K-State Table Tennis Club, of which Surowski is the faculty adviser and active player.

Surowski established the club at K-State in 1987 in conjunction with the United States Table Tennis Association, an affiliation that allows the club to conduct sanctioned tournaments.

The early days of the club were anything but easy, he said.

"When we started with the club, we had nothing — no tables, no nets, no room to play," he said. "To start the club, I went to the K-State Union recreation office and asked them to provide us with two tables. I thought they wouldn't do it.

"But they said they would if we would host the table tennis part of the Union's international tournaments at K-State in exchange. Of course, I gladly accepted to do that."

After receiving the first two tables and two additional ones, which were bought by the members, the club moved to Luckey High School for its weekly practice.

With a modest supply of tables, the club began having tournaments. The first activity of the club was a demonstration tournament at the Manhattan Town Center in September 1988.

In addition to sponsoring the Union's Region 11 Tournament for players in Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Missouri, the players also have club tournaments and travel to other tournaments around the Midwest.

The latest event in which the K-State members competed in was a One Star Tournament in Manhattan Nov. 23. In the one-day event, 45 players braved bad weather conditions on their way to Manhattan to compete in nine different divisions.

K-State came out with four winners and a second-place finish by Vance Voth in the open singles bracket. Voth lost in the championship match in two sets to Bernie Braun of Kansas City, Mo.

The fact that people refer to table tennis as "ping pong" doesn't bother Surowski. He said ping pong is actually the right way to describe the game with the little white ball.

Table tennis is called ping pong in China, he said.

"It also expresses the sound when the ball is hit by the paddle — 'ping.' Whatever you call it doesn't matter. In America, it's table tennis. In China, it's ping pong."

In the future, Surowski said, he would like establish a team to play against other squads, giving the members an additional opportunity to Say goodbye to wildcat head

Football symbol, Willie the Wildcat holding a flag remain as K-State logos

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

In with the new and out with the old. This is how K-State is dealing with its abundance of logos.

The newest K-State logo, a contemporary version of a wildcat that was introduced three years ago, has been widely accepted as representing K-State. The old wildcat head, which is a real depiction of a wildcat, is being dropped from the University sheet of logos.

Assistant Athletic Director Chris Peterson said that by using a more contemporary mark, K-State joins a list of other schools that have done the same, including Penn State, Syracuse and Washington State.

"The positive reviews outweigh the negative by three times," he said of the new logo.

"The new logo has certainly caught on as a major item," said John Fairman, assistant vice president of University relations.

Dropping the old wildcat head from the University sheet of logos will leave K-State two main logos — Willie the Wildcat holding a flag and the new one.

"A university doesn't need three logos," Peterson said.

Fairman agrees.

"Some schools only have one logo, like the University of Kansas."

The University also uses two other logos, the University seal and the men's basketball logo, which is an orange basketball with the word "Cats" written across it. It was introduced by former men's basketball coach Lon Kruger when Bramlage Coliseum opened.

But even though the old logo is being dropped, if anyone wants to continue using it, the University would most likely go ahead and approve of it, Fairman said.

Even so, he said the old logo did not originate at K-State. It is rumored it was taken from Northwestern University and introduced in the 1930s at K-State, when logos weren't protected. Northwestern and the University of Kentucky, which also use the old wildcat head as a logo, have never complained.

"Using it is something you never feel right about if it wasn't yours to begin with," he said.

As for the new logo, it is a K-State original. It was introduced by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics three years ago when Bill Snyder took the football coaching position.

"Coach Snyder felt he needed to change the whole look of the football team, and the logo was a concern he had. He wanted to give the team a new look," Peterson said.

Local illustrator Tom Bookwalter designed the logo as a gift to the K-State athletic department. He has also worked on projects for the National Football League and the National Basketball Association.

Since then, the athletic department has transferred rights of the logo to the University, so any organization on campus can use it.

KSDB-FM 91.9, the student-operated radio station in McCain Auditorium, is one organization that is using the logo to represent itself.

"It's important to be linked to the University," Station Manager Joe Montgomery said.

"It's a visually exciting logo. You look at it and automatically see K-State," he said.

As for any of the remaining logos being dropped or replaced in the future, Fairman said he doesn't see that as likely. Especially in Willie the Wildcat's case.

"Dropping Willie would cause hard feelings," he said of the logo that was introduced in the mid-1960s.

The logo story

One of three of K-State's logos is being officially dropped. The logo being dropped is a realistic depiction of a wildcat head. The remaining logos are shown here.

- Developed by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics
- Coach Bill Snyder initiated the change to create a new image for the football team

- Willie the Wildcat was introduced in the mid-1960's
- This is the current version of Willie.

K-State belongs to the Collegiate Licensing Company, which represents 104 universities, including four other Big Eight schools.

Any company that wants to produce a product with the K-State name or logos must send a sample of the product and artwork to the licensing company and the University.

The licensing company makes sure the product meets industry standards, and the University makes sure it is a good representation of the K-State and not demeaning.

Fairman said if the University finds the artwork vulgar or in gross judgment, the K-State has the right not to approve it.

Fairman, who has the final say on all artwork involving K-State, said his job is difficult when he has to decide upon artwork involving humor.

"My humor isn't up to speed with students. I can't let my ideals of humor act as the final judge," he said.

If the University does approve the artwork, the company pays 7.5 percent of what it costs to make the product to the licensing company. For example, if a company produces a K-State shirt for $1, the licensing company receives .075 cents. K-State then receives a share of that, which is put into the scholarship fund.

Fairman said the University has received an average of two requests per day in the last two months.

Hill said. "You can name them what you want. They can be in the form of what you can relate to.

"I don't take that literally," she said. "It's a presence or being that I can center myself on. I get my power through them."

During medieval times and in colonial America, Wiccans were often persecuted and sometimes killed because of their beliefs, she said.

"When I told my mom, she told me that I was going to hell," Hill said. "Then I started reading some of the history and philosophy of Wicca to her, and now she at least accepts it.

"Most of my friends are open minded enough that they want to hear more about it," she said.

Mussatt was recently associated with Wicca because of a photograph that appeared in the Collegian.

"I haven't heard any negative comments," he said. "People don't call me 'devil worshiper' or anything like that.

"I'm sort of surprised about that. Not many of my friends knew how I believe. It's not something you usually go announcing. Of the people who care about me and who I care about, we still view each other in the same way.

"Most everybody that I knew was just curious about it. I've only come across a couple of people who have looked at me differently," Mussat said. "A lot of people were sort of proud. It was like, 'Hey, you stood up for something you believe in.'" one local coven.

"The coven here in town is a very peaceful group. They work their magick and go their own way," he said.

Magick that witches practice is called white magick. They rely heavily on herbal medicine and the concentration of psychic energy and natural forces to direct their magick, he said.

Many witches wear ceremonial robes while performing rituals. Others participate in some rituals skyclad (in the nude).

In some cases, Christian rituals have a basis in pagan beliefs.

The date chosen for Christmas is an example of the blending of Christian and pagan beliefs.

"There was a pagan holiday around that time of year," Linder said. "It's not the exact date, but Christmas isn't a very exact date.

"The Winter Festival became the celebration of Christmas. Its not the day Christ was born by any stretch of the imagination," he said. "As far as we can tell, he was born in the spring sometime."

Halloween, known to witches as Samhain, is the most famous witch holiday. It has been distorted over the years. Originally it was a gathering on the eve of the Celtic new year, Nov. 1.

Europe closer to federation, single currency

12 nations continue 2-day summit to form political power

By the Associated Press

MAASTRICHV, Netherlands — Leaders of the European Community, with the exception of Britain, edged closer Monday to adopting a single currency as the first step of their proposed federation.

The leaders led off a two-day summit, probably the most important in their 34-year history, by tackling the remaining obstacles to a merger — no later than 1999 — of the economic and monetary policies of their 12 member-nations.

They have been struggling to overcome their differences in the hopes of creating a European union of about 338 million consumers with a common foreign, security and, maybe, defense policy.

The nations want to develop the political muscle to match their economic might, which could approximate that of the U.S.-Canada-Mexico market of 355 million residents.

On the sidelines, British and French officials conferred with each other — and with Washington — over the declaration of a new commonwealth of Russia, Ukraine and Byelorussia to replace the Soviet Union. The move raised immediate fears about the control of the Soviet nuclear arsenal.

"To have a safe world, we do need certain undertakings as to how people holding those nuclear weapons behave," said Britain's foreign secretary, Douglas Hurd.

The community decided to send an envoy to the three republics.

Community sources said all but British Prime Minister John Major voiced strong support at the summit's opening for a monetary merger, with a common central bank and currency as early as 1997. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity.

Major, the most reluctant to sign on to ambitious plans for a united Europe, demanded an "opt out" clause that would allow Britain to decide later whether to scrap the British pound for the new European currency.

Dutch Finance Minister Wim Kok, whose nation holds the community's presidency, said most leaders rejected a British proposal giving all nations the right to drop out at the last minute.

Instead, he said, a "large majority" declared that once started, the drive toward monetary union should be "irreversible."

Finance ministers worked out a formula so a sole money, the European currency unit, or Ecu, would replace the French franc, German mark and other currencies as early as 1997 — and no later than Jan. 1, 1999.

Only those countries meeting strict economic conditions — low inflation rates and modest budget deficits — could belong to the European Central Bank and circulate a common currency.

Dutch Queen Beatrix, who welcomed the leaders to this ancient town on the Meuse River, said, "I am prepared to make a contribution by sacrificing my head on our coinage to the Ecu."

After ruling out a compromise with Britain, the finance ministers also sought wording for a declaration that would allow a future British Parliament to decide its participation.

European Community

- After 34 years, a two-day summit is bringing the European Community closer than ever to a merger in 1999.
- The Community also discussed with the U.S. the new commonwealth of Russia and its effect on world security issues.

Council may monitor halls

Feedback about housing could be heard by January if group approved

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

A housing council that would meet each month to provide feedback about residence hall life could be functioning as soon as January if it is approved.

Housing Director Chuck Werring has proposed the idea of the council to Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, who will decide on whether or not to go ahead with it.

The current housing council meets once a year to discuss rates and listen to proposals, but they don't make decisions, Werring said.

He said the goal of the new council would be to find out how students in residence halls feel about residence hall life.

"I want to make sure we are feeling the pulse of what is going on in residence halls," he said.

He proposed the council consist of students from the Association of Residence Halls, the Hall Governing Board, as well as a faculty member, a University staff member, representatives from Jardine and Pittman, and a few at-large students from the residence halls who are not involved with student or residence hall government.

"It's an opportunity for students to get involved that haven't been involved before," he said. "It's important to have the at-large students, because they have opinions different from the others who are involved in government," he said.

If the council is approved, Werring said he would not be in charge of picking its members.

Leadership Development Coordinator Alejandro Delgadillo said members of the KSUAR Hand HGB have already volunteered for some of the positions on the council.

Recommendations from the hall director staff will be considered to choose the at-large members, he said.

kids doesn't end in the classroom. Along with being an active Boy Scout leader, he is a big fan of K-State sports. To show his purple pride, he regularly attends games and supports the football, men's and women's basketball teams, and the band.

Part of his support is betting on the outcome of the games. The bet is a bottle of imported German beer with the assistant dean of nuclear engineering, Donnert said. Over the last five years, Donnert has been way ahead in beer, he said.

"I'm generally not a betting person, but for a bottle of German beer, OK," Donnert said. "I considered the KU-K-State game a sucker bet for him, but the Cats didn't cooperate."

After 25 years at K-State, retirement is not in the immediate future. Eventually, Donnert would like to write a math study guide book for engineering students or continue research in nuclear energy, he said.

"Except for sexual harassment, they can't get rid of me," Donnert said. "But on the other hand, I'm eligible to retire.

"If the time comes someone really pisses me off, I can leave," he said.

Donnert's devotion to K-State can be seen by his support. As he said, he is a die-hard K-State fan. He wears purple to class everyday and has even contemplated painting his house purple.

Sullivan said Donnert has stayed with K-State because he loves K-State.

Smith's testimony delayed a day

Judge may bar discussion of previous assault allegations

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla.— William Kennedy Smith was poised to testify Monday at his rape trial, but his lawyer first sought assurances that Smith wouldn't be asked about previous sexual assault allegations against him.

The legal question over Smith's testimony arose after Smith's mother made a brief witness-stand appearance, and a doctor gave jurors a lesson in human sexuality saying a rape could not have occured exactly as the accuser described.

Defense attorney Roy Black filed a last minute motion to bar any mention of the so-called "Williams rule witnesses" when Smith is cross-examined by a prosecutor. Two women have said Smith attempted to rape them, and one says he raped her in the 1980s.

"We want to call Mr. Smith as a witness," Black said, "but we want to make sure the state can't open the door on cross-examination and enter evidence the court has ruled irrelevant."

Circuit Judge Mary Lupo, who barred the testimony earlier, said she had decided to forbid any mention of it during cross-examination. But prosecutors complained they had been given no notice of the motion and no opportunity to research legal precedents. Lupo reluctantly recessed court an hour early to give them time to prepare and said she would hear arguments in the morning before Smith testifies.

She suggested it was unlikely she would change her mind.

Florida's Williams Rule allows testimony about other "strikingly similar" assault allegations in rape cases. Lupo has ruled the similarities in this case are not striking.

In each case, the women told of being lured to Smith's residence where he allegedly pounced on them without warning. The women, a medical doctor, a medical student and former girlfriend of Smith's cousin, came forward after the Florida case arose but never reported the incidents to police.

Smith's mother, Jean Kennedy Smith, testified for about 10 minutes, identifying the layout of the Kennedy estate, saying family members use the estate on a time-share basis. Smith said she heard no screams or other noises on the night the woman said she was raped.

longer exist is also illegal and dangerous. It can only aggravate chaos and anarchy in society," Gorbachev said in the statement.

Gorbachev said the plan had some "positive" aspects. But he said the Soviet Parliament should decide whether the commonwealth would supplant his proposed Union Treaty to keep the country together.

Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who sat in the Kremlin meeting with Yeltsin and Gorbachev, said he believed the Soviet president "still has not exhausted his opportunities" as a leader.

In what appeared to be a compromise to Nazarbayev and Gorbachev, Yeltsin on Monday agreed to let republics' legislatures consider the commonwealth plan "parallel" with Gorbachev's Union Treaty, Nazarbayev said.

It was unclear whether Yeltsin would delay implementing the commonwealth plan.

The move by three of the most powerful republics further muddied the situation in the Soviet Union, which has had worsening food shortages and increasing ethnic conflicts. There also have been rumors about possible new coup attempts by opponents of the Kremlin giving up its powers.

The latest evidence of the Soviet Union's disintegration heightened fears in the West about possible civil unrest and what that would mean for Soviet nuclear weapons. The European Community decided Monday to send a special envoy to assess the situation.

Russian and Soviet officials sought to reassure Western nations Monday that Soviet nuclear weapons would remain under a centralized authority and not be divided among the republics

At a Monday news conference in Kiev, Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk said he, Yeltsin and Byelorussian leader Stanislav Shushkevich would have control over nuclear weapons.

There "will be a triple control. The black box will be controlled by the three states that have nuclear weapons. This black box can be activated only when three buttons are pressed at the same time," Kravchuk said. "All this enhances control of nuclear forces."

Kravchuk did not mention Kazakhstan, another republic with nuclear weapons, but the Russian foreign minister said Yeltsin spoke with Nazarbayev on Sunday and "there is no dissent" between the two men on nuclear issues.

Nazarbayev emphasized that whatever state structure emerged, leaders were united on the need for radical reforms to avert economic collapse. But he cautioned them to be careful not to ignite civil unrest.

"The leaders of ... the republics and President Gorbachev must stop cursing each other," Nazarbayev said.

Soviet Union faces chaos, instability

Creation of new commonwealth 'pure coup d'etat'

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail Gorbachev's aides said Tuesday that the creation of a new commonwealth by three republics was a "pure coup d'etat." But they gave conflicting signals on whether Gorbachev would resign in the face of his crumbling authority.

Their comments reflected high-level uncertainty over the Soviet president's position since Russia, Byelorussia and Ukraine decided Sunday to create a new commonwealth and declare the Soviet Union dead.

Aides said Gorbachev was still in control of the Soviet nuclear button. They also said he considered himself president of the entire country, including the three Slavic republics.

Yet since the failed hard-line coup in August, Gorbachev's central government has been stripped of almost all powers by the republics. Ordinary Soviets have little sympathy, because they blame him for an unprecedented economic slide and dizzying inflation.

Russian Federation President Boris Yeltsin has shut off funding to scores of Soviet ministries, putting Gorbachev in the humiliating position of presiding over a power structure that is disintegrating, discredited and broke.

Presidential adviser Georgy Shakhnazarov predicted that the resignation of the 60-year-old Soviet leader, who came to power in March 1985, was just around the corner.

"The situation is developing in a such way that it probably won't be necessary to wait long for it," Shakhnazarov told a conference of young politicians.

Nevertheless, presidential spokesman Andrei Grachev insisted that his boss had no immediate plan to step down.

"The president's position is that at present, and as far as he feels that he has the possibility to exercise substantial political influence, he's going to secure for that (struggle) all his efforts, so far as this is in his power," Grachev told a news conference.

Western leaders have deep expressed concern at the rapid-fire developments in the Soviet Union. CIA chief Robert Gates, testifying in Congress, said Tuesday the country is "dangerously unstable" and predicted the worst civil disorder this winter since the Communist revolution in 1917.

And in a Washington speech, the U.S. ambassador to Moscow, Robert Strauss, said strong opposition to the commonwealth could bring its downfall. He also said frustration in the Soviet military could lead to another coup, and voiced worry over control of the Soviet arsenal of 30,000 nuclear weapons as Moscow's central command is thrown into question.

Gennady Burbulis, Yeltsin's top deputy, skirted the question Tuesday of whether Gorbachev is still commander-in-chief of the Soviet armed forces.

"I think we will resolve that issue in the next few days," he said.

But Shakhnazarov and Grachev said Gorbachev still commands the country's vast nuclear arsenal.

The Byelorussian and Ukrainian parliaments on Tuesday ratified the commonwealth treaty reached Dec. 8 in Minsk, the Byelorussian capital.

Ukrainian lawmakers added amendments emphasizing that their republic is fully independent and will create its own army. That army will be under the commonwealth's military structure only until the nuclear weapons based in Ukraine are eliminated.

Gorbachev a figurehead, CIA director says

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union faces chaos this winter as the former Communist empire spins apart and President Mikhail Gorbachev is reduced to little more than a figurehead, CIA Director Robert Gates said Tuesday.

"The situation is dangerously unstable," Gates told the House Armed Services Committee, even as U.S. Ambassador Robert Strauss raised doubts about whether a new commonwealth of Russia, Ukraine and Byelorussia can survive.

Gates later met with the lawmakers behind closed doors and told them that Gorbachev "is losing out" and may have to step down, according to the panel's ranking Republican, Rep. William Dickinson of Alabama.

"He will have to either resign or be a figurehead only, because he doesn't have any force behind him," Dickinson said.

Another source, speaking on condition of anonymity, agreed, saying Gates portrayed Gorbachev as in control only of the country's foreign relations — and even that is eroding. "He's not going to rise from ashes this time," the official said.

During open testimony to the committee, his first public assessment of the Soviet situation since taking office Nov. 12, Gates referred to the disintegrating superpower as the "arsenal that used to be a country." He said the system controlling 30,000 nuclear weapons is being severely tested.

"Severe economic conditions, including substantial shortages of food and fuel in some areas, the disintegration

KSU may keep financial status quo

Faculty Senate asks how K-State could gain support from Finney, Legislature

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

In a best-case scenario, K-State will remain in a financial status quo unless some sort of state revenue increase package can be agreed upon in Topeka.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, and Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, spoke to Faculty Senate during its Tuesday meeting about what to expect from the upcoming legislative session and the likelihood of a tax increase, which would aid the University's current money crunch.

Glasscock said without an increase in revenue, budgets would have to be cut.

"If we don't pass a tax increase and increase revenue, their present projections show the state could spend $10 million more from the general fund than last year.

"Federally mandated changes in social services indicate just in that program alone, they need a $17-million increase," he said. "The situation we face is that there may have to be additional budget cuts.

"The problem is how long can the state allow the system of education to deteriorate without some highly negative results," Glasscock said. "That's the concern Faculty Senate has and is probably shared by the entire Manhattan delegation."

The local legislators answered questions from various members of Faculty Senate.

Many of the questions focused on how K-State could garner more support from Gov. Joan Finney and the Legislature to mitigate problems at the University, such as low faculty salaries and increased work loads.

Glasscock said there needs to be more effective communication with a broader number of legislators to get a tax increase passed and then be able to override a governor's veto.

"She gives no support, so we need a super-majority," he said.

Glasscock said to reach more legislators, K-State's Faculty Senate should become more pro-active and network with other faculty senates.

Oleen said there is another reason it may be hard to convince many legislators to vote for a tax increase, because it is an election year.

"People do not readily vote for a tax increase. A lot of people like to vote no and take the dough," she said.

Glasscock said there is hope, however.

"I'm basically not a doom and gloom type guy. Yes, it will be a difficult year, but I think there is a strong commitment to higher education in the Legislature," he said.

Edge expects record year

Campaign raises $12 million in last 6 months

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

The Essential Edge Campaign is on its way to another record breaking year, campaign director Mark Moore said.

More than $12 million was received in the last six months, including two gifts of more than $2 million each to the University libraries and the art museum. These gifts are the largest to date.

"Ideally, you hope to have a few gifts in the $2 million plus range," Moore said. "I had concerns because the economy is not good and was very pleased to receive the two gifts in the $2 million range."

The campaign's College of Agriculture project has also done well this semester with a $250,000 estate gift from Norman Currie of Scandia. The donation allowed the college to be the first of 11 campaign projects to surpass its goal.

Agriculture is now at 102 percent of its $12 million goal.

Walt Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, said although the project goal has been met, the campaign will continue to raise funds for the college.

"By going beyond our original campaign goal, we have the opportunity to position the College of Agriculture as one of the finest in the nation," Woods said.

Moore said the success of the agriculture project is due to its large amount of constituency support.

University libraries and the art museum do not have that support. However, after a slow start they are obtaining their goal, said Marjorie Morse, co-chair of the University libraries project.

"Nobody majored in the library," she said, "everybody used it but no-

Teaching proposals fail

Kansas in no need of new certification program, University representatives say

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — University representatives told the state Board of Education on Tuesday they see no need in Kansas for a new program to certify as teachers people without education degrees who have expertise in other fields they could share with students.

Charles Kofoid of Pittsburg State University, chairman of the Regents Council of Deans, and Mary Hoy, dean of the education school at Fort Hays State University, were among four people who testified on two proposals to expand alternative certification of people to teach who do not have traditional educational backgrounds.

They said present state law provides a method for certifying those people and they believe it is adequate.

However, legislators and some educators believe the present process is too cumbersome. They think public schools should be able to more easily take advantage of people in business, industry, the professions, higher education and the military who want to share their knowledge with elementary and secondary students.

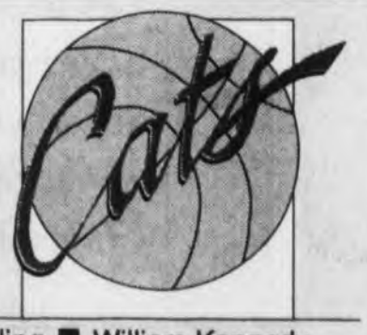
A third witness, Barbara Cole of Kansas-National Education Association, said her organization doesn't oppose the concept but wants requirements for alternative certification to be equal to those for standard certification.

Only Cynthia Akagi of Grantville, who worked for two years in the Perry-Lecompton school system as a teaching para-professional, spoke in favor of alternative certification during the state board's monthly meeting at Topeka High School.

Akagi, who said she wants to become a teacher, thanked the board for considering the proposals.

"I know there are some of us out there who would really like to do this if there was a way," she said. Being required to enter a three-year teacher education program in order to become certified, she said, "is a large burden."

However, she said she did not think the state would be flooded with applicants.



Proposed certification methods

- Persons from industry or other professions could be certified for one year by being issued a "visiting scholar certificate"
- College graduates with a degree in the area taught could be certified if they passed pre-certification tests and completed an eight-week teacher education workshop.

Nominations for EOY being accepted

Nominations are now being accepted for the Kansas State University Employee of the Year Awards for 1992.

A classified employee will be selected from each of the three employment categories — secretarial/clerical, service/skilled crafts and technical/professional. The winners will be announced during ceremonies in McCain Auditorium April 9, 1992.

Stephanie Harvey, office supervisor for the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications office, will be handling this year's awards activities.

"We feel it's very important to recognize employees who have shown a great commitment to K-State," Harvey said.

Nine employee finalists will be chosen — three from each category — by the University's classified senators. Finalists will chosen based upon the individual's accomplishments and contributions in 1991 and interviews with colleagues.

A nominee must be a K-State classified employee who has been continuously employed in a permanent position and in a pay status for at least one year at the time of nomination. Staff in the K-State Union, Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, KSU Foundation, KSU Child Development Center, KSU Alumni Association, Student Publications Inc. and county Extension offices are also eligible.

"Anita Fahrny, Marvin Farmer, and Carl Warner were named last year's employees of the year," Harvey said.

Deadline to submit nominations is Jan. 10, 1992.

The awards have been given out since 1978.

Meats Judging team reserve champs

K-State's Meats Judging Team was the reserve champion winner at the International Meats Judging Contest.

Seventeen teams of four competed at the international meet at the IBP Meat Packing headquarters in Dakota City, Neb. Texas Tech won the competition.

Though K-State placed second, it had three individuals place in the top ten, including a first place individual finish by John Stika, junior in preveterinary medicine.

"K-State has had a tremendous heritage for meats judging, and I was glad to see that we could continue it," Stika said.

Andy Clawson and Brian Dunn, both juniors in animal sciences and industry, won third and tenth place, respectively. Angie Krizek, senior in animal sciences and industry, also competed.

The team previously placed seventh at the American Royal, which Dunn said inspired members to work harder.

Though team scores were tallied, Stika said that the contest is done on a more individual basis.

"We work with so many people on a team, but there's no consulting with each other," he said.

"The scoring is done just like a track meet, where each member does their thing, and it all goes toward the team."

KU Fraternity building burns

LAWRENCE, Kan. (AP) — Fire damaged the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity building at the University of Kansas late Monday, campus police said.

The extent of the fire was not immediately known, but there were not believed to be any injuries, said campus police Lt. John Mullens. Fraternity members had been evacuated.

Mullens said further details would have to come from the Lawrence Fire Department, but firefighters and officials were at the scene and unavailable to talk shortly before midnight.

However, witnesses said the fire appeared to have been contained to the northern side of the top floor of the three-story building, located on the west side of the campus.

Heavy smoke poured from the third-story windows, but flames could not be seen. Witnesses said they first heard fire engines respond about 11:30 p.m., and that the fire appeared to have been contained within about 20 minutes.

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

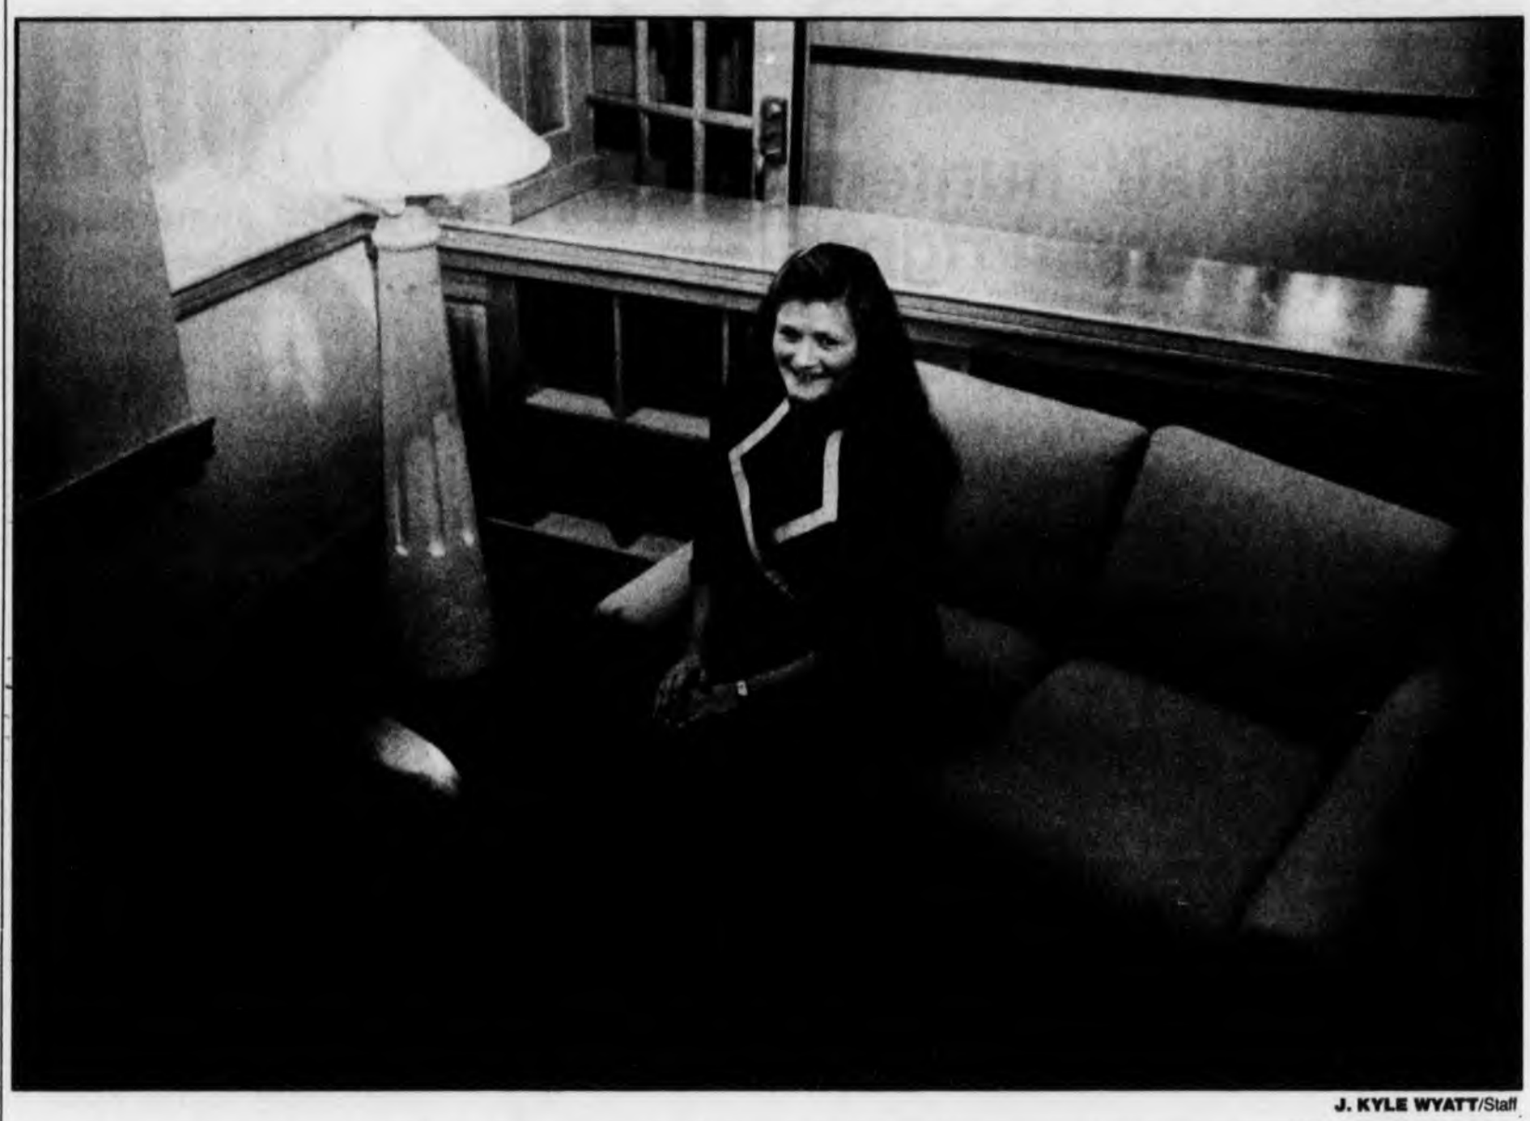
But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.



"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for

Are student government leaders and apathy locking out the rest of us from the university governing process?

KYNDALL THOMPSON, THE STATE NEWS, MICHIGAN STATE U.

Questions surround student governments

By TERRY SEBASTIAN
The Eastern Progress, Eastern Kentucky U.

Is student government a forum for public service or a self-serving forum?

Critics of the student government system point fingers at elected officials who they call unsupervised and ineffective, while student officials cite their accomplishments and say some of their plans are hindered by apathetic student bodies and administrative red tape.

Who's right? Or, to some extent, are both sides?

"There is some apathy and plus there is some personal gain and 'what will it do for my resume' type thing, but there is just too much work to put it all on that," said Dr. Kurt Keppler, commission chair of student development of the National Association for Campus Activities, which oversees student governments.

At the ballot box

Many of the problems trace back to election day, where low voter turnout spotlights students' lack of interest in the candidates and issues. In turn, this often leads to student officials not truly representing the student body as a whole.

U. News and Notes

Truly Magical

In an age where HIV rolls off the tongue as easily as ABC, Magic Johnson's announcement was still hard to comprehend. It hit us at U. especially hard, as the news coincided almost to the day with the arrival of our November issue, with its AIDS cover story, on campuses nationwide. Though the focus of the two stories differed, several callers on our opinion hotline linked the topics together.

"You're talking about testing doctors, which make up only a small percentage of the population," said one caller from the U. of Iowa. "But look at what happened to Magic — he didn't catch it from a doctor. I think we need to shift our focus to testing the population at large to protect everyone."

And in the words of a student at the U. of North Texas, "If it can happen to Magic, it can happen to anyone. We have to do as much as we can, and testing doctors is just a start."

Earth Watch

Keep an eye out for "The Environment," our special issue out this month. The environmental movement is one of the most active and successful on many campuses these days, and we've tried to capture the spirit of the cause and examine the issues surrounding it.

And of course, once you've read the paper, don't forget to recycle it.

Color schemes

Speaking of green, three freshmen at Berry College in Georgia were rolling in the greenbacks. Problem is, though, apparently they were rolling them off their own printing press.

It seems their scheme came to an end when they allegedly were caught passing the $20 bills at a local convenience store and fast-food Mexican restaurant. If they were going to go to all that trouble, the three students could have at least used the money to pay for tuition, not tacos.

Round and Round

And while we're still on this green kick, let's talk about the putting variety. Eric Freeman, a student at Northwestern U., holds the distinction of being the world's fastest golfer. Freeman played a hole of golf every minute and 40 seconds, for a grand total of 429 holes in 12 hours.

After his feat, Freeman said, "I didn't go out looking for a record to break, I just love golf."

Sure, Eric. Everyone goes out for a leisurely golf excursion armed with 392 golf balls and 50 spectators.

Off and running

It's a no-lose situation for students who throw their hats into local political rings

By BILL FRISCHLING
The State News, Michigan State U.

Christine Larson thought she had a good idea of what to expect when she ran for city council in Madison, Wis., last spring.

But she was wrong.

Larson, who was elected as alderperson in April, immediately was faced with working on a $124 million city budget. For a woman who graduated last spring from the U. of Wisconsin, the experience was a rude awakening.

"I still haven't gotten over the effects of it," said Larson, now a graduate student at UW. "I had attended council meetings and knew basically what to expect, but I didn't know about everything that went on backstage."

Larson was one of many students who threw their hats into the local political ring in college towns, as students at Michigan State U., Bowling Green State U., Pennsylvania State U. and other schools tried to break into borough, town and city councils. Though students often make up a substantial portion of the population in these towns, the governing bodies usually are dominated by permanent residents.

Scott Ziance, a junior at Bowling Green, wet his political feet in campus politics before venturing out into the city council elections this fall. He wanted to try his hand at a "higher level" of government, and will get his chance in January when he's sworn in to office.

Ziance said he found his welcome mat into city politics caked with other people's dirt.

"I was pretty naive when I began my campaign. I had no idea the amount of work involved and I didn't expect the way issues were going to be misrepresented," he said.

Ziance campaigned in a door-to-door manner and found a "surprisingly subtle difference" between his reception from students and permanent residents. Some students, he said, voted for him because he was a student, while some residents wouldn't for the same reason.

Now that he's won, Ziance wants to construct a "Greek village" at an abandoned Heinz factory, and plans to institute sensitivity training for the police department to attune them to student needs.

KYNDELL THOMPSON, THE STATE NEWS, MICHIGAN STATE U.

The agony of defeat? Despite losing his bid for a city council seat, MSU student Kris Unger smiles as he watches election returns.

Larson has been working since April to make her difference in Madison. Her first major project bloomed Oct. 28, when city bus service began in student neighborhoods. She continues to work on obtaining money for transitional housing for homeless people.

So far, Larson feels it's working out just fine. "It's a hoot," she said.

But some cities were not as receptive to student candidates. Kris Unger, an senior at MSU who, along with Joe Derhake, ran a write-in campaign for the East Lansing City Council, found permanent residents favored non-student candidates.

"They did not like us," Unger said. "They saw us as a threat. They thought we would take over their backyard and pave it over."

Unger finished the election with less than 900 votes, a showing he said was disappointing because of the low student-voter turnout.

Nichol Barlett, a senior at Penn State who ran unsuccessfully for Borough Council in State College, said many students weren't aware that they could vote only in their designated precincts. "That's one of those real-world things you're supposed to know," she said.

But coming in last does not always mean a total loss. Unger, who finished eighth in a field of eight, believes the entire election process "was a great learning experience." And now that it's over, "I can start focusing on school work again."

Johnson still weaves his magic at alma mater

By SUZETTE HACKNEY
The State News, Michigan State U.

The news that Earvin "Magic" Johnson had tested positive for the HIV virus shocked Andrew Wells, the Los Angeles Lakers star's former Michigan State U. roommate.

"Sometimes I find myself still disbelieving that it happened to him," Wells said. "When something like this happens to anyone, I am upset and it takes time for it to sink in — but because this is Earvin, it is just devastating."

Although Johnson's basketball career is over, his new life is just beginning, said Wells, who now serves as director of intramural sports at MSU. Wells also believes that Johnson's candidness will help other people.

"Magic has thrilled millions of people on the basketball court and now it is time for him to thrill them in other ways," Wells said. "He now wants to enlighten people on how to protect themselves from the virus. He has proved himself to be a perfect role model."

Wells wasn't alone in his reaction. Like the rest of the world, MSU virtually stood still last month as Johnson announced his retirement from professional basketball because he had contracted the HIV virus.

MSU basketball coach Jud Heathcote released a statement regarding Johnson, who

COURTESY OF MICHIGAN STATE U. SPORTS INFORMATION

Magic Johnson's announcement stunned fans at Michigan State U., his alma mater.

he coached for the '77-78 and '78-79 seasons.

"Like all of Earvin's friends and basketball fans everywhere, I'm shocked, devastated and concerned," Heathcote said. "Earvin Johnson was not only the greatest basketball player that I've ever coached, but he was the greatest competitor and winner that I ever coached."

Student reaction was supportive toward one of the school's most famous alumni.

"Magic is the nation's hero, but he is our brother and friend," said MSU senior Candy McCrary. "Because he went to our school, we have a special bond with him. Michigan State University is behind him.'

MSU sophomore Sherece Tolbert said she is more proud of Johnson than ever before.

"I have always been a fan of Magic's, but now I really respect him," Tolbert said. "He was definitely brave to come out and admit he had the virus."

Tolbert said Johnson's announcement heightened AIDS awareness.

"Magic came out the next day and told us he had the virus," Tolbert said. "Other celebrities waited until they were almost dead or died before the truth came out. It was important for him to make the announcement because he is a heterosexual.... Maybe [other Americans] will begin to think, 'Wow, this can happen to me too.'"

MSU freshman Rob Turner said although he almost cried when Johnson made his announcement, he was happy that his "big brother" was handling it well.

"He's like a big brother to me — he's like a big brother to anyone who has ever played or watched basketball," Turner said. "I'm sorry that I won't see him play anymore, but by making this announcement it just proves that he's a class act all the way through."

Forget the votes and pass the crown

By KEVIN F. SHERRY
The Daily Northwestern, Northwestern U.

On most college campuses, the general consensus seems to be that the student government pretty much does nothing. But a subject of heated debate among representatives is deciding exactly how to go about accomplishing nothing.

For those organizations that actually are allowed some autonomy from the school administration, the most popular method is that of checks and balances. That means the president, his relatives and friends steal as much money as possible, and hope that no one checks the balances.

Once discovered, such schemes can lead to resignation and impeachment. On the down side, it's good training for those who wish to pursue a real-life career in politics.

The second most popular means of accomplishing nothing is to have an administration that ignores every student request, thereby rendering the government impotent. While not especially democratic, this system streamlines dialogue between student representatives and the administration:

Student government president. "Sir, we have passed a bill making it safer, less expensive and more fun for students to..."

Administration president: "No."

Student government president: "Thank you for your time, sir."

The saddest tool available to student governments is the referendum. It gives the impression that since the administration won't listen, the student government needs something to take to them and say, "See? See, Daddy? I told you that's what my friends think. Why won't you listen to me?"

The referendum is also an admission of incompetence by student representatives:

Senator A: "Do you know what anyone thinks about this?"

Senator B: "About what?"

Senator A: "The issue."

Senator B: "What issue?"

BRIAN BENDIS, OBSERVER, CASE WESTERN RESERVE U.

Senator A: "I forget. Let's get our constituents to vote on it."

Senator B: "What's a constituent?"

Every couple of elections, an "outsider" candidate enters the political picture. The goal of this person is to alter or abolish the current system of government and institute a new one founded on insanity and chaos.

These candidates usually lose, primarily because most students who vote tend to be mindless lemmings who already think student government is cool. In many places, a 20 percent turnout is considered a success.

The trick is to mobilize the other 80 percent to vote for the chaos candidate. Then the fun would begin. Imagine resolutions denouncing the school's administration or resolutions denouncing the student government itself. The possibilities are endless.

Is there one student representative anywhere in this for the good of the student body? The time has come to find a better way. Democracy is fine on a grand scale, but when placed in the hands of marble-jawed people named "Biff" and "Muffy" who think they're still in high school, things can get out of hand.

I propose all schools adopt an elected monarchy. Whatever the top person says, goes. No more parliamentary procedure, no more bickering over rules and regulations, and no more spending entire meetings trying to remember who had the gavel last.

Each college would declare itself an independent kingdom. Instead of elected representatives, knights would be appointed by the king or queen. If it ever were discovered that the ruler was pilfering funds from the royal coffers, off with his head. New election.

But for some reason, I don't think people will take kindly to this plan. Students generally seem happy with the bastardized form of democracy that colleges have spawned or too apathetic to do anything.

I suppose we are doomed to eke out the rest of our existence, comfortably numb, led by con artists and resume padders.

I would join you, but I have to go get fitted for my crown.

Sex article misleading

To the editor:

In the article, "I Want Your Sex," (Oct.), a student from Creighton U. is quoted as saying, "One day we all had to have an orgasm for class." I want to set the record straight on this point: The human sexuality class at Creighton has no such requirement.

We are concerned about several issues. You have published a quote attributed to an individual who denies making it, and the quote is untrue. It describes an activity in a human sexuality class on our campus that simply does not occur. Indeed, the professor of that class, Dr. Daniel Murphy, told me, "There is absolutely no requirement to do anything sexual for this class.... It is antithetical to everything the class stands for." In addition, the reporter did not seek any corroborating evidence.

The article embarrassed the university, the professor and the student.

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

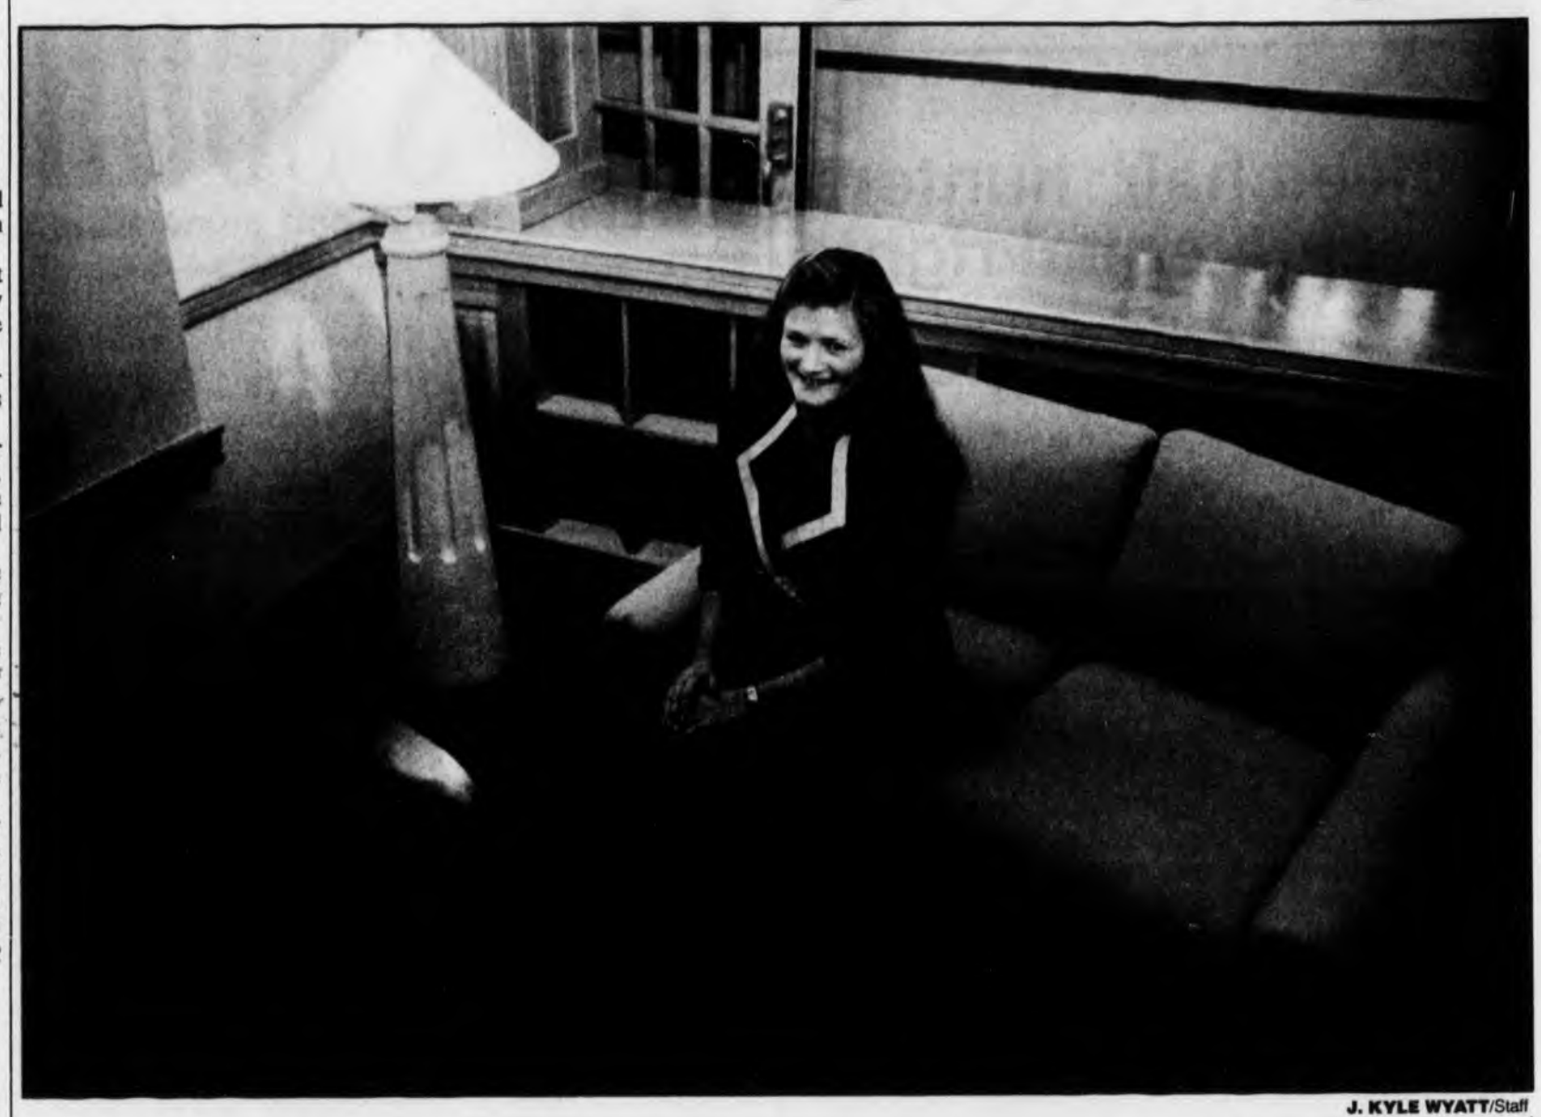
But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.



"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for

Campus security unchanged after shooting spree

By ANN RILEY
The Daily Iowan, U. of Iowa

Despite last month's shooting spree at the U. of Iowa where a graduate student killed five people and critically injured a sixth before shooting himself, officials at UI don't anticipate any major changes in campus security.

"I think the main thing now is to make sure people know that this was a highly unusual event," said UI President Hunter Rawlings. "Not the kind of thing that could have been predicted or even stopped if someone has that kind of purpose in mind."

Gang Lu, a doctoral physics candidate, was angry because his dissertation wasn't nominated for an academic honor, and he shot the UI physics professors who nominated another student for the award, the student who was nominated, the chairman of the physics department, the vice president handling his complaint about the award and a member of her staff.

UI public safety officers, who were in charge of the shooting investigation, do not carry guns. Although there was some discussion on campus about changing that policy, Rawlings said officers would not be issued weapons.

Government

At the U. of North Texas last spring, only 973 – or 3.8 percent of 25,750 students – voted in the Student Association elections. And at Wesley College in Dover, Del., only 47 of the school's 1,300 students elected Student Government Association officers.

These schools are not unique. Student government leaders nationwide cite poor election returns as a major problem.

Malinda Lawrence, student body president at the U. of New Hampshire, called lack of voter interest a "big, big, big problem. Ask anyone about student government and they'll say, 'This campus is so apathetic.'"

Lawrence said UNH also had problems finding candidates to run. "We can never fill all the seats that we have," she said.

Raising Questions

Election day aside, campuses recently have been awash in controversies questioning the scruples of student officials. Incidents of fixed parking tickets and falsified travel vouchers at the U. of Missouri-St. Louis, allegations of unreasonably lavish expenditures at the City U. of New York, and a case at the U. of Kansas where the student body president allegedly hit his girlfriend have tarnished already less-than-glowing reputations.

Such actions don't sit well with students, who say they have a hard time taking officials seriously when these reports surface.

"Our representatives have been mishandling our trust in them," said Gary Garufi, a student at the UM-St. Louis. "When student representatives do this, all students look bad."

Gaining and maintaining credibility is a tough battle for organizations that students commonly perceive as weak.

"I really don't see a lot of what they're doing," said Belinda Bankes, a senior at the U. of Cincinnati. "They have a place on campus where you can write in your opinion but a lot of it is never seen... students don't feel like the senate can benefit them in any way."

> "Our representatives have been mishandling our trust in them. When student representatives do this, all students look bad."
> — Gary Garufi
> U. of Missouri - St. Louis

Student government leaders at some schools have issued warnings to their senates to avert criticism.

At the U. of South Carolina, student vice president Shine Brooks advised representatives to "return to the people who put them in office."

Brooks said his statement was not in response to any particular incident on his campus, but a preventative measure.

Making Progress

Working to better students' interests is the main goal of campus governments, a task met through various channels.

At Pan American U. in Edinburg, Texas, a major project involved relaying students concerns to the state legislature, which proposed changes to the student loan program, said senator Tony Mercado.

"We've taken the initiative as far as actually lobbying at our state capitol and holding press conferences and rallies on campus," Mercado said.

At Eastern Montana College, the Association of Students spearheaded a campaign generating 2,000 letters to the governor to protest tuition increases, said student body vice president Angela Marshall.

As a link between students and administration, student governments work hand-in-hand with school officials, a relation-ship most administrators find satisfying.

LuAnn Krager, dean of students at the U. of Arizona, termed her interaction with the Associated Students of the U. of Arizona as rewarding. While she doesn't always agree with the senate's actions, such as hosting Andrew Dice Clay last year, she supports its right to make decisions.

But Colleen Sullivan, assistant director of programs at UNH, believes the senate could benefit from closer supervision. A professional staff member could help with training and provide consistency, she said. "Each year, the new leadership of the student senate has to start all over again and I think that they lose a lot," she said.

Tige Watts, The Gamecock, U. of South Carolina, contributed to this article.

Growing up a star takes its toll on River Phoenix

By DAN SACHER
The Daily Pennsylvanian, U. of Pennsylvania

River Phoenix is 21 years old and press-weary.

"I've been doing this press thing for the last three months," Phoenix said. "It's ridiculous. And the funny thing is you'll never know actors. You're never going to know me or (co-star) Keanu (Reeves) or let's say, De Niro. It's all hearsay."

Despite River Phoenix's caveat, an almost deafening clamor follows his latest starring role in the film "My Own Private Idaho," Director Gus Van Sant's follow-up to "Drugstore Cowboy."

And it's not just the shuffling feet of standard fare paparazzi.

It's one of those infrequent situations when mass appeal stars step out of their pop culture stratosphere to delve into high art.

They validate the audience's ultimate hope that they're not stars just because they are dashing, young and handsome, but because they are highly sensitive and, yes, even talented.

In the last 3 months, no fewer than four feature articles about the film have appeared in publications like the New York Times Magazine, Premiere, People and Film Comment.

And "Idaho" garnered major awards at both the Venice and Toronto film festivals recently.

All of the attention is not without reason. The merits of "My Own Private Idaho" are unquestionably high.

Arguably, it exists beyond criticism. Being so real and so bold, the film seems unaware of any responsibility to please, only to intrigue.

The film concentrates on the lives of Mark (Phoenix) and Scott (Reeves), two male prostitutes on the rough streets of Portland. Van Sant does not approach the film with that simple of a slant. He composes the film on a variety of levels, gliding effortlessly from harsh street reality to the vaguely surreal.

Some scenes ring true as documentary, others speak with poetry lifted directly from Shakespeare's verse.

Van Sant elaborates, "I was playing with styles all the way throughout the film. When I was writing the screenplay, I envisioned these different modes."

Alluding to the collaborative spirit of the film, Phoenix said, "We defined every scene – documentary, neorealism, Shakespearean – stylistically doing a step ladder into and out of each mode. It's such a hard thing to pull off."

The Shakespearean element of the film rests in Scott, the ne'er-do-well son of the Portland mayor.

His mentor, Bob (William Richert) is a character pulled directly from Van Sant's shady, curiousity-induced experiences on "the street."

"Scott's a pseudo-character playing out his time. He's not of the street. He's not for the street. He just wants to taste the street," Phoenix said.

"It's the real shit. No corny dialogue. It's not using reverse psychology catch phrases like, 'I love you,' slap, 'I want to screw you.' I mean c'mon, get out of the way," he added.

Aware, and wary, of the tired conventions of Hollywood, he reflects on his own recent career choices. He sees a need to play an active role in his casting.

"That's one thing I've really worked on, because you've got to take responsibility to cast yourself. 'Cause they'll throw the part on you. I mean for example's sake, Dillon – God bless his heart – did "A Kiss Before Dying." For me, I mean I just can't be that cool. I don't have it in me, so I didn't do it."

With the exception of "A Night in the Life of Jimmy Reardon," Phoenix has obviously been vigilant in the parts he has taken. River came to Idaho just off the set of "Dogfight," a low-budget picture by Nancy Savoca.

"There was nothing really strategic about doing those films. I wasn't trying to say anything or prove anything. There are just so few good scripts out there that when you find one you jump on it."

Clockwise Orange: Keanu Reeves and River Phoenix are red hot in New Line's 'Idaho.'

There is a mix of cynicism and weariness in his voice. Granted, it's early in the day, but two days previous at a 5 o'clock press conference, he seemed equally drained.

It's evident that he cares about both movies coming out this month and he's sincere in his desire to give each question more than just the perfunctory answer. It's also clear that he's a bit frustrated.

"I really don't like movies all that much. There's more to life than movies. Especially since most things are bullshit."

The first nine years of his life were spent in or around Caracas, and his parents did missionary work in South America. He attended Montessori school down there and had an easy time. "I would count one hundred beads, and they'd put me in the first grade. I was great," he said.

After spending a year in Florida, his parents packed up the whole show and moved to Hollywood.

"Talk about culture shock. I mean, I got it," he said. "I knew what was going on. Everyone was just fucking angry, fucking pissed off. Hard-up, abused by their family, the world, the streets. All these rich kids, children of celebrities, and they're fucking perverts. They're out of their minds."

It's this keen sense of people and what makes them tick that makes Phoenix an effective actor.

The ease with which he finds identity in the most foreign of rolesis rooted in that interest.

At the end of the press conference his work is done.

He has fielded a plethora of questions and looks anxious to move on.

Van Sant and Phoenix leave the stage after the critics' screening of Idaho. A reporter's hand raises and fingers snap in the crowd.

"Over here Gus, River," someone yells. A flash clicks, burns.

"Loved it, it was great."

Smile, click.

"'Preciate it, thanks."

"'Preciate it."

Another voice, "Over here."

Click.

Click, snap.

'Father of the Bride' divorces itself from original

By JOANNE CHOI
Daily Bruin, UCLA

"Don't forget to fasten your condom" may sound like a slogan for safe sex, but it's not. It's Steve Martin's bit of advice to his daughter in Touchstone Pictures' remake of "Father of the Bride."

In this hilarious updated version of the 1950 Spencer Tracy-Elizabeth Taylor film, Martin plays the eccentric but loving father of Annie Banks (Kimberley Williams) who must deal with the anguish of his daughter leaving the fold.

The writer/director/producer husband and wife team of Charles Shyer and Nancy Meyers ("Private Benjamin" and "Baby Boom") have breathed new life, as well as a rediscovery of family values, into the 1950 classic.

Diane Keaton plays Martin's wife, Nina. She is a successful mother, wife and career woman. Unnlike the original film, which lacked a strong maternal figure, Nina's strong presence and warmth marks a significant departure from the original and acts to balance George's idiosyncrasies.

Before his daughter returns from a trip abroad, George Banks (Martin) has an ideal life as a successful athletic shoe manufacturer with a perfect family and perfect home. When she returns, he discoves that Annie is no longer his little girl.

While enjoying a family dinner, George learns that his 22-year-old baby girl is engaged. A series of humorous and tender scenes follow as George fights to keep the ever-growing burden of marriage costs from demolishing his picturesque life.

With characteristic charm and humor, Martin wins the audience over as he undergoes more anxiety and trials than the bride-to-be.

The film marks the debut of Northwestern U. junior Kimberley Williams as the free-spirited and femininst Annie. Unlike the original film, Martin must contend with fears that his daughter, an architecture school graduate student, will have to subsidize her husband.

Williams brings wholesomeness and girl-next-door looks to a film that reinforces traditional family values and feminine issues.

The 1991 version includes plenty of modern touches, including Martin Short as Franck, an ultra-hip, artsy-fartsy wedding coordinator whose accent and price list run amok as he struts around like the Mad Hatter.

Three of a kind

She's where every aspiring college actress wants to be. Signed to a three-picture deal with Touchstone Pictures, Northwestern U. junior Kimberely Williams already has worked with some of Hollywood's best.

Working with comedy titans Martin and Keaton proved to be an awe-inspiring experience for Williams.

"Steve and Diane treated me as their equal," she said. "They even taught me how to play poker."

Williams said the film taught her a lot about marriage. "I think I'm not going to get married for awhile, especially now that I've gotten it out of my system. She "got married" 30 times during filming.

When she ties the knot for real, she hopes to emulate her screen counterpart, who wears designer bridal tennis shoes during the ceremony. "It's a lot more comfortable than high heels." ■ Joanne Choi, Daily Bruin, U. of California, Los Angeles

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

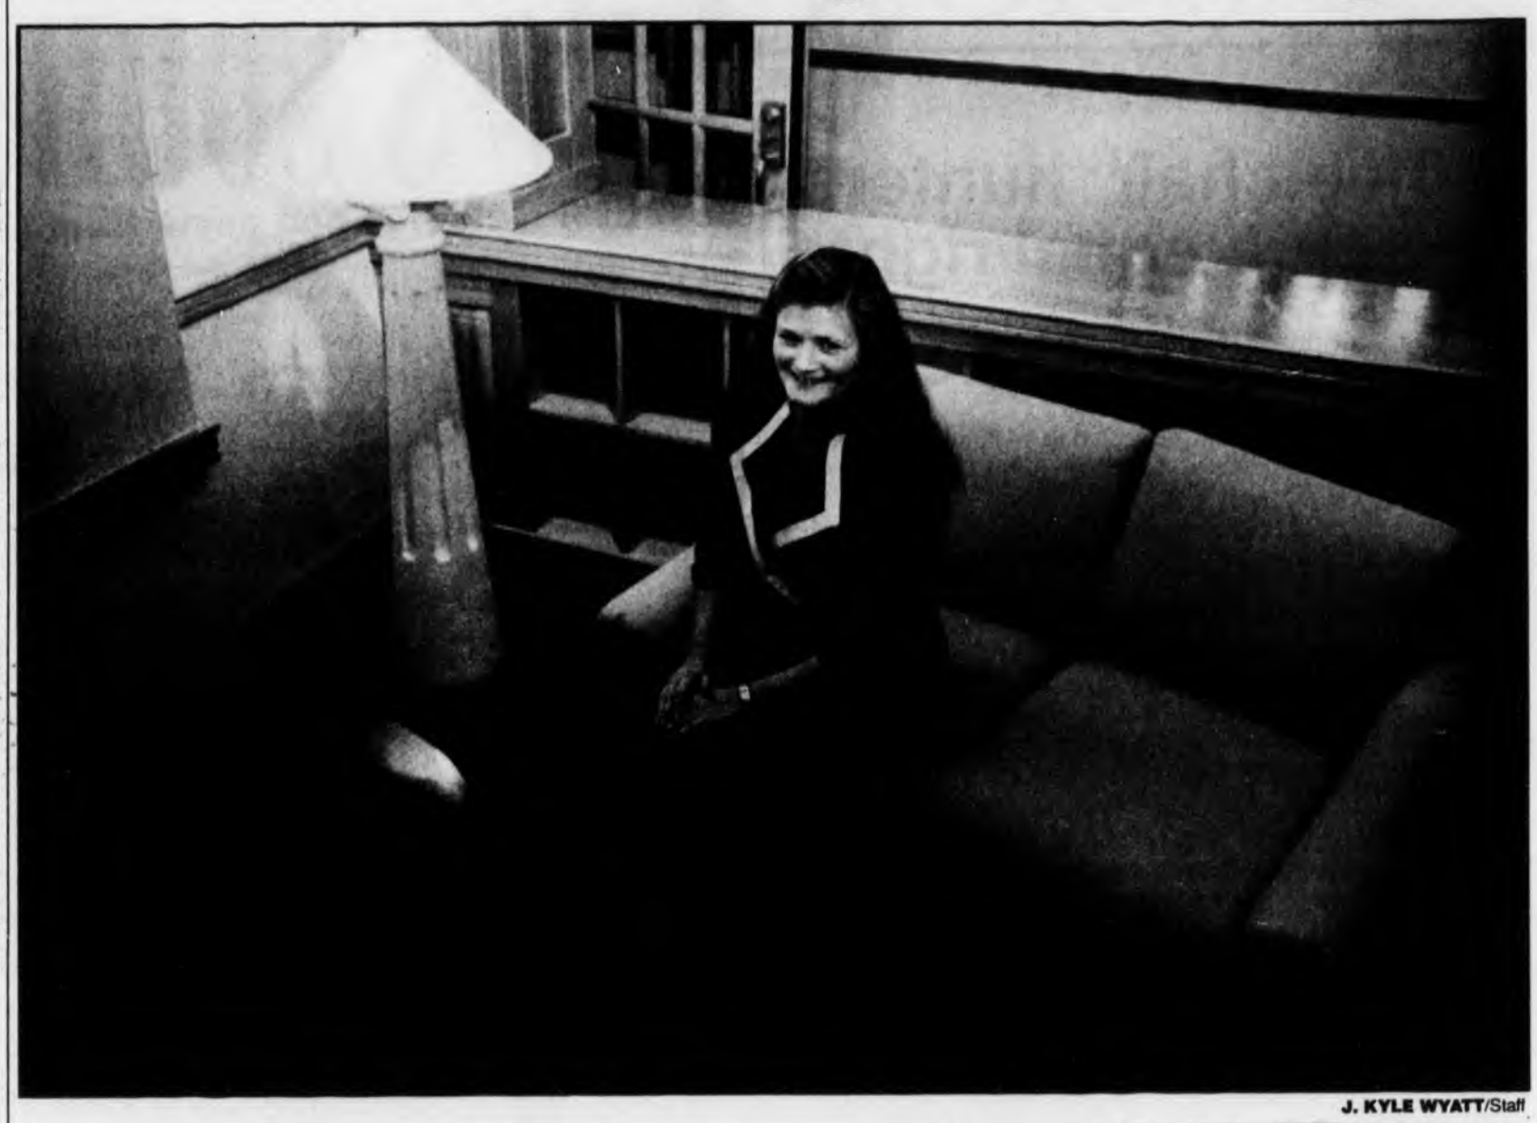
But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.



"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for

Scorsese's 'Cape Fear': Moviemaking to die for

By AARON DOBBS
Daily Brain, U. of California, Los Angeles

One, two, he's coming for you....The Bowden family (Juliette Lewis, Jessica Lange and Nick Nolte) are up against a psychotic ex-con, (Robert De Niro) in "Cape Fear."

It's unusual for a remake to be better than the original film. Something's almost always lost in the transition.

But in the case of "Cape Fear," director Martin Scorsese not only surpasses the terror of the 1962 version starring Robert Mitchum and Gregory Peck, he also redefines the psychological thriller the same way he redefined mafia drama with 1990's "Good Fellas."

Add Wesley Strick's intricate storyline and the compelling performances of Nick Nolte, Jessica Lange, Juliette Lewis and, most notably, Robert De Niro to Scorsese's near-perfect direction, and what we have is a motion picture audiences should die for.

The basic story is simple and almost identical to the original. Max Cady (De Niro) is released from prison after serving a 14-year sentence. All he could think of during his incarceration was revenge against the man who helped put him there – Sam Bowden (Nolte).

But Cady doesn't want to kill Sam, at least not at first. He wants him to experience the loss he felt during his 14 "missing" years. To do so, Cady terrorizes Sam's wife Leigh (Lange), and 15-year-old daughter Dani (Lewis).

Strick's script makes Cady more calculated and the film much more thrilling. With obvious help from Scorsese, he creates a family more realistic for the '90s. The original family, in which Peck played Sam, was a tight, happy unit. That's fine for 1962, but in 1991 the Bowdens are on the verge of self-destruction. Sam tries hard to stay faithful. Leigh is recovering from heavy depression and near suicide. Dani can't stand the fighting at home and has to attend summer school for having a joint in her locker.

One of the most important differences between the two pictures, though, is the basic essence of character for each of these men. The original movie shows a basic struggle of good versus evil, but this film doesn't depict a pure "good." Cady's actions are horrifying, but Sam is no longer "Father Knows Best," and at times the audience feels empathy for Cady.

The camera work, shot by two-time Academy-Award winning cinematographer Freddie Francis ("Glory"), is very fast-paced, accelerating the action and bombarding the audience with visual punches. Scorsese's camera almost never stops moving, and when it does, the characters don't.

The most noticeable change in this picture from its predecessor is the injection of religion into the storyline, a major Scorsese theme. In many ways, Cady believes his actions will actually "save" Sam.

One aspect of the film that was not really changed is Bernard Hermann's original score. The music from the original "Cape Fear" was fantastic and terrifying on its own, but adapted, arranged and conducted here by Elmer Bernstein, the music actually becomes even more haunting and forceful.

In addition to the actual filmmaking, the acting is superb across the board. Nolte is fantastic as Sam. He gives Sam the necessary fear, guilt and frustration at being totally helpless.

Lange and Lewis both benefit from well-fleshed-out female characters, something the original film didn't have. Near the end of the film, Leigh gives a speech about loss which completely describes her character. Lange's performance in that one scene is one of the best of her career.

Lewis certainly holds her own, an impressive accomplishment considering the company she's keeping.

Appearing in cameo roles are Peck and Mitchum, the former as the lawyer who defends Cady and the latter as the police lieutenant who tries to help Sam.

Still, all these great performances are eclipsed by De Niro's, who – if there is any justice in the world – could very well win his third Academy Award. He is a chameleon able to physically and mentally immerse himself into the role of Max Cady.

"Cape Fear," one of the finest pieces of filmmaking to come out this year, is definitely the movie to see this winter. It's pure entertainment with a couple of messages thrown in, and it'll scare your socks off.

Christmas season is here, and with it comes a slew of films to top off 1991. In a ritual as traditional as geese flying south for the winter, filmmakers have joined the holiday rush in an effort to get their films in under the Academy Awards wire.

City of Joy – It looks as if Patrick Swayze finally landed a role in a film that has some semblance of a plot and does not play on his sexy- guy image. Swayze portrays Max Loeb, a young American doctor who is beaten and robbed outside a bar in Calcutta. A poor Indian peasant Hasari Pal (Om Puri) comes to his aid and takes him to the City of Joy Self-Help Clinic. Loeb gets a job there and learns the harsh realities of life facing the poverty-stricken people of India. "City of Joy" is directed by Roland Joffe, whose previous works include "The Killing Fields" and "The Mission." The movie is the first to be filmed entirely on the crowded streets of Calcutta.

A mafia man and his moll.

Bugsy – Will America's fascination with the Mafia ever end? Not as long as filmmakers keep pumping out mob thrillers like "Goodfellas," "The Godfather" trilogy and "Mobsters." Warren Beatty stars as Ben "Bugsy" Siegel, who rises from a young, aspiring gangster to legendary mob mogul status in director Barry Levinson's release. "Bugsy" portrays Siegel at the height of his crime-ridden career duing the 1940s. It's westward ho for Siegel and the Mafia when our underworld hero picks up his digs in New World and moves his operations to California and Nevada. Siegel will dazzle viewers with his charm, innovativeness and infidelity as he builds a resort-casino and paves the way for the gambling metropolis we know today as Las Vegas.

Fried Green Tomatoes – This film promises to be more appetizing than its name. Oscar-winner Kathy Bates plays Evelyn Couch, a woman on the hairy edge of a mid-life crisis who befriends a nursing home patient (Jessica Tandy). Her tales of family, friendship, love and murder in her hometown of Whistle Stop, Ala., provide Evelyn with the fuel to change the course of her life. The film is based on Fannie Flagg's best-selling novel Fried Green Tomatoes at the Whistle Stop Cafe and casts talented actresses Mary Stuart Masterson, Mary Louise Parker and Cicely Tyson.

Star Trek VI: The Undiscovered Country – Trekkies will get one final look at the Starship Enterprise under the command of Captain James T. Kirk (William Shatner). Twenty-five years of futuristic magic will end in thematic resolution with this final chapter in the Star Trek series. Original cast members, including James Doohan, Walter Koenig, Nichelle Nichols and George Takei, will reunite with Shatner, Leonard Nimoy and DeForrest Kelly before being beamed up into filmmaking history.

The Prince of Tides – Barbra Streisand directs, produces and stars in this drama that explores the complexity of family relationships. Streisand plays Susan Lowenstein, a psychiatrist who tries to help a troubled patient by delving into her family's history. Dr. Lowenstein enlists the help of her patient's brother, Tom Wingo (Nick Nolte). Tom leaves a crumbling marriage to encounter a painful journey into a troubled past that has affected him and his sister Savannah (Melinda Dillon). The film looks at the effects seriously flawed parents have on the lives of their children. And, of course, there's always room for romance as Tom falls for Dr. Lowenstein.

'Beast' brings 'toon time back to life

By MARISA LEONARDI

Something about the magic of animation appeals to the child in all of us.

COURTESY OF DISNEY

Animation lives.

"Beauty and the Beast" reunites Disney with the song-writing team of Howard Ashman (who died earlier this year) and Alan Menken, who also did the award-winning music for "The Little Mermaid." The magic of that film has carried over to "Beast."

The story is a familiar one, with a few extra twists to satisfy modern audiences.

It has everything that a classic Disney film should: lead characters who are good, but not perfect; beautiful, imaginative scenes; catchy songs and frightening villains.

For many years, it seemed that animation was dead. With the help of Disney, animation has a new life.

Does Nirvana smell like teen spirit?

By MEDWIN PREGILL
Columbia Daily Spectator, Columbia U.

Fast, thrashy, hairgod band makes brilliant debut album on hot, trendy independent label, tours like crazy, gets big contract on big label (big money?). Long-anticipated second album arrives: well-produced, slick, catchy choruses, cool lyrics, really melodious harmonies ballads, strings even. Shock and indignant cries all around. Critics, fans say sellout.

Screw you, says Nirvana.

This is what happened when Nirvana released Nevermind, their major-label follow-up to Bleach, a stunning 1989 debut on Sub Pop. In the fall of 1989, Seattle became a hot city, grunge was harder and cooler and faster than ever and Nirvana became one of Sub Pop's most popular acts. They hit the road, toured the whole universe (twice) and then, last spring, they were signed by the David Geffen Company. The April issue of Spin reported that they got $750,000, the biggest contract ever received by an independent band.

Nirvana: "We're just kind of drunk and stoned most of the time."

A while ago, Nirvana's bassist Chris Novoselic was nice enough to let me interrogate him by phone. We spent the majority of our conversation discussing the significance of what appears to be, at least superficially, the symptoms of The Big Sellout. The biggie is the DGC contract, the rumored sum of which is "absolutely not true," Novoselic assured me. Their primary motive for signing with a big label was "just to know we could actually have our records in stores."

"We're totally aware that we're a commodity for the label," Novoselic admitted. But rather than feeling pressure from the label to conform to some executive's conception of commercial, he thinks that the band has the upper hand. "They know it works, so why would they fuck with it? They're there to help us, to put our records in the store. We're satisfied 'cause they work for us. Besides, th worst thing they could do is drop us," he said.

Now, people are kind of evil, and they do lie sometimes, but Novoselic plays it straight — no way has Nirvana sold out, and the best proof is the album. The band has refined its songwriting and playing, and no doubt somebody is going to protest because of one ballad — but Nevermind is a great next album.

Musically, the big change from Bleach is that several of its best songs are more accessible than those on the first record. Singer-guitarist Kurt Cobain always wrote cool songs, but a lot of the lyrics and melody on Bleach, frankly, were incomprehensible due to the production, an astounding amount of feedback, and the fact that Cobain just used to scream a lot.

But Nevermind sports fairly good production, and rather than washing out the band's raw edges, this album focuses attention on the songs' killer arrangements. Nirvana's greatest talent lies in building thrashy, muscular riffs on top of great, catchy pop songs, placing them with the likes of Screaming Trees, Dinosaur Jr. and Lemonheads. Nirvana believes that pop music is an art, that a song written a certain way, verse-verse-chorus-verse-verse-chorus whatever, can achieve something beyond disposable entertainment. They seek to produce what Novoselic called "three minutes of bliss" — gorgeous, stunning, captivating... liberating.

Cobain claims that the album's name is a commentary on the fake, affected apathy of youth, as is the first song, "Smells Like Teen Spirit," with the telling lyric, "I find it's hard it's hard to find/oh well whatever never mind" before breaking into the chorus, "Well the light's out this is dangerous/here we are now entertain us/I feel stupid and contagious/here we are now entertain us." A lot of Kurt's lyrics are annoyingly ambiguous, as in "Come As You Are," which is purportedly "an old-fashioned love song," the chorus of which is simply, "And I swear that I don't have a gun."

Novoselic refused to comment on the meaning of their songs, saying that their music is "just all energy and cool lyrics." (I insisted, and was told, "Well, we're just kind of drunk and stoned most of the time.")

Nevermind is like an incredibly contagious disease. Perhaps a better allusion is to the spiritual state of self-annihilation the band's name evokes, chosen deliberately to describe their music. It encompasses an impressive range: freedom, escape, and most of all, total release.

Top 10 reasons to hate The Wonder Stuff

The Wonder Stuff — Never Loved Elvis, definitely never loved America, but seem to love themselves quite a lot. "Anything else is merely secondary," they say.

By LINDA MEMMER
University Times, California State U., Los Angeles

In the lobby of the Hyatt in West Hollywood, I nervously wait for the hotel operator to connect me with Miles Hunt's room. When he picks up the phone, I tell him that I am on my way up to talk to him.

Without hesitation, and in the type of bratty voice usually restricted to sibling squabbles, he says, "No you're not." My introduction to the Wonder Stuff's leader was neither informative nor enjoyable....

One cancelled interview and three days later, I try again. The Wonder Stuff, who recently completed a 20-city U.S. tour to promote the band's third release, Never Loved Elvis, was taking a short break before beginning tours of Australia and Japan. From his home in London, Hunt and his attitude problem are quick to say that the best part about touring is "going home."

The lead singer and chief songwriter of the sharp-edged English pop band is brutally opinionated about American concert-goers. Compared to easily pleased European audiences, Hunt finds Americans "a great deal more critical" than their jolly Brit counterparts. Furthermore, he whines, Yanks "want you to prove yourself to them."

Considering his negative attitude toward everything even somewhat related to American culture, it's no surprise that he and the Wonder Stuffers named their album Never Loved Elvis. Like many things, it's the idea of Elvis that doesn't agree with him. Hunt has said he doesn't like "the whole marketing machine that turned (Elvis) into a god."

But despite Mr. Hospitality's... er... Mr. Hunt's sentiments, the band has created some truly great music on Never Loved Elvis. They hurl traditional Celtic sounds with violins, acoustic guitars, mandolins, and soul. Songs like "Caught In My Shadow" and "Mission Drive" are pleasantly catchy, whereas "Size Of A Cow" and "Welcome To The Cheap Seats" are undeniably witty.

But even though fans here and abroad may appreciate this band's records and live shows, Hunt boasts the Wonder Stuff is around for the sole purpose of making its five members happy. "Anything else," he says, "is merely secondary."

Gee, sounds almost American, huh?

The Farm: Freakin' out over a little success

By CHIP PHILLIPS
Daily Bruin, U. of California, Los Angeles

"It always puts a smile on me face to think that I'm in America and Mick Jones invited me," nods a smiling Carl Hunter, The Farm's blithe bassist, backstage before a gig with B.A.D. II at the Hollywood Palladium.

"When The Farm first formed eight years ago, probably nobody in the band dreamt that we would be sitting in a dressing room now, in Los Angeles, about to play to 3,000 people," Hunter continues, musing at the thought. "We try to take it in stride, you know, day to day and all. But it sort of comes as a shock; playing so many gigs in so many new and different places. The other day I called me mum and she says, 'Are you all right? Where are yuh?' And I said, 'We're in the Arizona desert! How are you?'"

Things have been hot down on The Farm in 1991, a year consumed with the completion of the band's first full-length studio album. The yield is Spartacus, a U.K. chart-topping album sensation, featuring the two U.K. top-five singles "All Together Now" and "Groovy Train," as well as a strong harvest of eight additional rations of original Farm fodder.

Drawing on the creative energies of musical pioneers such as the Jam, the Clash, and the Buzzcocks, The Farm has gained notoriety for unashamedly embodying the working class ethic of its listeners, a percipient political sensitivity, a healthy contempt for hypocrisy, a love for soccer and a tight, groovy musical style and sound.

"Throughout the years, record companies had shown a bit of interest but they never thought they could market the band," Grimes says. "They always thought that we were too scruffy, that we had no image. It's ironic now, because a lot of record companies are looking for bands that look like us. Four years ago they didn't want to have anything to do with us and now they're looking for bands that look like The Farm!"

And they're listening for bands that sound like them.

"'Altogether Now' has been a hit in about seven or eight European countries, all at different times of the year," Grimes says. "We would get phone calls saying, 'You're doing well in Spain. You've got to get over there!' and we would. It's been crazy!"

And what better way to follow up a crazy year but with another album, due out next spring. It seems they grow hits big down on The Farm.

"We've got to record the new LP," confides Grimes with a grin, obviously knowing what the new season holds. For now, they can reap what they have sown.

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.

"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for

SOUNDBITES

U2
Achtung, Baby

U2 has gone back to their roots, back to the hungry sounds and emotional grit of their youth. Their latest release is a desperate attempt to escape high-tech commercial oblivion and remain relevant.

Achtung Baby revives the art of music – it's everything you'd expect from a young, hungry band, but meshed with the incredible vision that comes only with experience. U2 has dug down deep and emerged with a gutsy and raw effort spiced with '70s influenced psychedelic funk.

The first single, "The Fly," kicks off with a Jimi Hendrixesque hallucinogenic guitar behind Bono's breathy and impassioned vocals. The Edge accents the mix with sharp riffs in his typical style, but with a fresh and new sound for the '90s. "Mysterious Ways," the album's second single, grooves in an extreme funk you'd expect only to find in a sewer deep in the heart of Cleveland.

The rest of the album is a mix of coarse jams flavored with several mellow emotional bloodlettings. Indeed Bono 's lyrics in this collection are dominated by matters of the heart – shallow poems buried beneath intricate, layered mixes.

Achtung, Baby is U2's attempt to go back to the days when music was meaningful, not something that anybody could put together with the help of a wizard-technician. U2 again proves they are true artists, not sleek and polished imitators. ■ Jenny Jenny, The Metropolitan, Metropolitan State College

Pixies
Trompe Le Monde

Hard on the heels of last year's celestial joy ride, Bossanova, the Pixies growl again with their most recent stinging love letter of hate and dreamlike visions.

Although matter-of-fact talk about flying saucers and distant planets still fills the cracks, they have abandoned Spanish bordello imagery for a smattering of French cliches. Nothing is spared on the sound however. They bump and grind about their usual mix of four-chord surf punk, four-chord waltz and four-chord scream, at times even getting a wee bit tender on the subject of sex ("Last night, he could not make it, He tried hard but he could not make it.").

"Subbacultcha" is the new Pixies statement of youth and independence while "Planet of Sound" redefines the popular standard for structured noise (previously defined on Bossanova). But when singer Black Francis ain't screaming about college girls or space travel, bassist Kim Deal hums a cherubic tune to plan your day by.

There is too much tromping going on to properly label their sound. But as far as the Pixies go, Trompe Le Monde is harder than the rest, softer than their best, but not really better. In fine Pixies form, it is simply weirder. ■ Greg Michaelidis, Prodigal Sun, State U. of New York, Buffalo

Lloyd Cole
Don't Get Weird On Me, Babe

If you think it takes Lou Reed or Elvis Costello to write intellectually stimulating alternative music, think Lloyd Cole. If you think it takes Frank Sinatra or Bryan Ferry to croon with passion, think Lloyd Cole. If you think it takes Sting or Paul Simon to blend musical genres, think Lloyd Cole.

Not only does Cole accomplish these goals on his new album, but he makes everything look easy along the way. The first side of the album showcases Cole's ability to effectively blend rock, blues, and folk into fresh, upbeat pop. Tunes such as "Tell Your Sister," "The One You Never Had," and "Weeping Wine" emerge as standout cuts and prove Cole a formidable songwriter.

If that wasn't enough, with the help of conductor Paul Buckmaster (best known for his work with Elton John and Miles Davis), Cole is accompanied by a full orchestra on the album's second half. Cole's post-modern approach to the Moody Blues' ethereal Days of Future Passed works well, especially in the tracks "Margo's Waltz" and "Half of Everything."

For those who are unfamiliar with Cole or his previous band, the Commotions, Don't Get Weird On Me, Babe will undoubtedly contain sounds that you've heard before. Cole's offering is unique because he manages to put them together in a manner that will make his music sound fresh for a long, long time. ■ David McDaniel, The Signal, Georgia State U.

Fugazi
Steady Diet of Nothing

Anyone who still believes that rock and roll is dead is not listening to bands like Fugazi. Underground, alternative bands like this are enough to jump-start The Beast.

Steady Diet of Nothing is post-modern, post-metal, post-punk and positively invigorating, filled with crash-and-burn guitar work and rollicking numbers like the title cut and "Latin Roots." Fugazi offers a bit of everything on this album. The haunting melody of "Long Division" will stay with you just as long as danceable cuts like "Nice New Outfit" and "Stacks."

And just as exciting as the music are the words – this is a band with something to say about the life we live. It's a shame alternative groups with the most lyrical statements ("America is a just a word but I use it") seem hidden in the corners of college radio.

Steady Diet of Nothing may not be for everyone – but it sure deserves a listen. Fugazi takes the example set by hard-driving rockers of the '60s and '70s and the influences of clean early '80s punk and new wave, and fuses these together to set the standard for the '90s. It's a welcome break from the "steady diet" of mindless commercial sludge the music industry thrives on these days. ■ Lisa Edmunds, Kansas State Collegian, Kansas State U.

DOLLARS AND SENSE BRIEFLY

Sweet house o' mine... For two university students, postcards they mailed this summer were definitely worth the cost of the stamps. Erika Aldan, a senior at the U. of Akron, won the opportunity to meet Guns n' Roses vocalist Axl Rose and also walked off with his condo in West Hollywood. "We're going to have an 'Evict Axl Party,'" where Rose will hand over the deed to his $425,000 condo, Aldan said. Jonathan Asch, a sophomore at the U. of California, San Diego, entered a Comedy Central contest and won $5,000 and a day on campus with anti-establishment comedian George Carlin, a high school dropout. ■ Eric Schmidt, The Guardian, U. of California, San Diego

But did they post their own bail?... Three freshmen at Berry College in Rome, Ga., were charged with forgery after local and campus police and Secret Service agents confiscated more than 100 counterfeit $20 bills. Police found the students after a convenience store clerk notified them that a young white male passed a phony bill in the store and gave them a description of the suspect's car. Police arrested two of the suspects after searching their rooms. Kevin Nejedly, the third suspect, who passed a phony bill in the local Del Taco, turned himself in. "I pretty much had to make an on-the-spot decision while being completely nervous and in a complete state of indecisiveness as to what to do," Nejedly said. "Unfortunately, I spent it." ■ Michelle Williamson, Campus Carrier, Berry College

Home sweet home... Most students work during the summer to help cover school costs, but few are as industrious as Brian, Liane and Brent Hores. The students built a house this summer and are selling it to help pay for college. Both Brian and Brent are studying architecture, Brian as a third-year student at the Boston Architectural Center, and Brent as a freshman at the U. of Tennessee. Liane is a junior studying environmental science at the U. of North Carolina. "We got on each others' nerves, but it drew us closer together," she said about the 12- to 15-hour days spent working on the two-story, two-bedroom traditional house. They hope to sell it for between $70,000 and $80,000. ■ Stephanie Johnston, The Daily Tar Heel, U. of North Carolina

Students find 'The Write Stuff'

By AMY APPLEBAUM
The BG News, Bowling Green State U.

College students are accustomed to reading books, but few have written their own.

Jayna Miller, a sophomore at Bowling Green U., entered a Landmark Editions, Inc., contest and won a publishing contract for her children's book, Too Much Trick Or Treat, which she wrote and illustrated.

Her central character, Jammer the Rabbit, is a cute and cuddly schemer who concocts a plan to steal his friends' Halloween candy. His friends turn out to be smarter than he realized as they foil his plan.

Miller found out she won the contest on a Monday, about a year after she entered. That Saturday she flew out to Kansas City to begin editing her book.

Contest winners are flown to Landmark, where they are assisted by professional editors and art directors in producing the final version of the books for publication.

Miller said the text was rewritten about six times, and each illustration was redrawn about 20 times.

Aside from spending time at Landmark last fall, Miller also worked on revising her book in her residence hall room.

She left Bowling Green spring semester to work full time on her book. She said she could not keep up with her school work and spend enough time on her book concurrently.

"It was a full-time commitment," she said, "more work than I could ever imagine. When I was (working on the book), I thought, 'Why am I doing this?'" she said. "Now I want to do it again."

When she returns to school, it may be to a college that offers a program in illustration. The experience, she said, was like four years of college in one.

Miller is spending a lot of this year traveling, mostly in Ohio, and lecturing at elementary schools to encourage children to write. She tells children about other students who have been published and teaches illustration. After she leaves, she hears stories about children who want to write. Lorri Hewett, a sophomore at Emory U., sent a manuscript to Hollaway House after reading through a marketing directory for writers. Her novel Coming of Age was released by them last summer.

The plot revolves around the lives of three black high school seniors who struggle to find out about themselves.

The students, two girls and one boy, become involved in each other's problems (which range from having mixed parents to a mother who committed suicide and a brother who is involved in a gang) and in a love triangle.

Hewett said she was skeptical about her chances of getting published because she didn't have an agent. Her main purpose in sending her manuscript out was to get some input from editors.

"I was basically lucky," Hewett said. "I've never known anybody in the industry."

She said having a book published has opened up a lot of doors, and she now has an agent. Warner Bros. Inc. has purchased the right to study the novel in order to decide if the company wants to make a film based on the book.

Hewett said she would love to be a writer if she could support herself. Getting another book published, she said, "will be easier, but not simple."

Mandatory insurance ruling affects student financial health

By TANYA BRICKING
College Heights Herald, Western Kentucky U.

The state of Kentucky told Julie Pincombe to have health insurance before she started classes this fall, but the freshman at Ashland Community College couldn't afford it.

Pincombe and Michael Kessler, a senior at the U. of Louisville, filed a lawsuit questioning the consitutionality of a mandate passed by the 1990 Kentucky General Assembly. The bill required undergraduate and graduate students attending state universities to have health insurance before Sept. 1.

But a judge ruled in August that Pincombe and Kessler could enroll without insurance pending the lawsuit's outcome and granted the suit class-action status.

Pincombe said she hopes lawmakers will repeal the law in January.

She said the law is discriminatory as well as costly. "It's almost like saying all black people or all such-and-such people have to have health insurance, and that's really not fair."

David Thomas, a legislative analyst with the Kentucky Health and Welfare Committee, said premiums would be covered by student financial aid for students who can't afford them.

Scott Coburn, Pincombe's attorney, said a minimum plan for most students would cost between $33 and $39 per semester but wouldn't include what most students need — outpatient care for such things as broken bones, colds and sexually transmitted diseases.

Thomas agreed that most students need comprehensive insurance, what many have under their parents' plans. For an individual, that would cost $250 or $300 a semester.

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

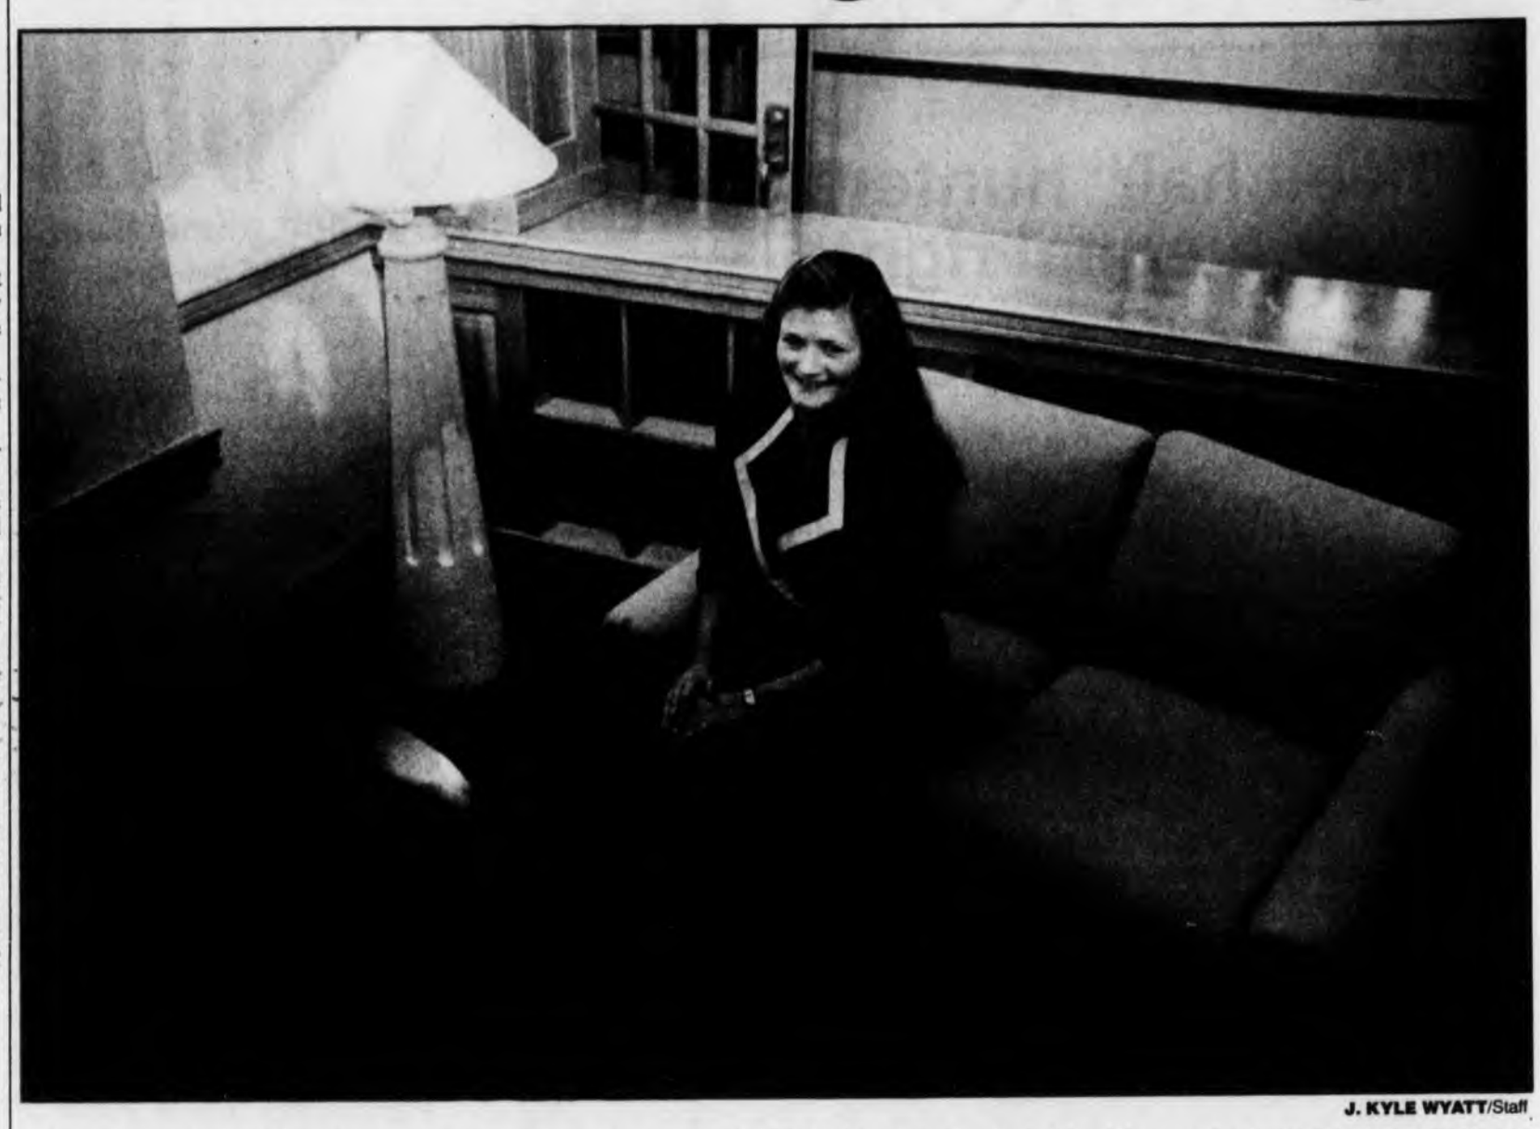
But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.



"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for

Recruiting abroad to win at home

By SHARON GINN
The Independent Florida Alligator, U. of Florida

She had been in the United States only two days before she was given her first formal introduction to living on a U.S. campus.

And when Gudula Staub, a volleyball player at the U. of Florida, had her bike swiped from right outside her dorm, she knew her induction into college life was complete.

"I saw it was gone and went, 'Wow! That is a new experience,'" Staub said. "That's America."

Staub, a native of Germany, is one of huzdreds of athletes from foreign countries who choose to train at U.S. colleges. They come to the states for different classes and new experiences, but most of all to improve in their respective sports.

Davor Rimac of the U. of Arkansas is a redshirt freshman basketball player who came to the United States from Yugoslavia to play high school basketball. This summer, Rimac went back to Yugoslavia, which is engulfed in a civil war, and was almost called up to fight for one of the country's two armies.

"That's why I came back a month early," he said. "I couldn't get ten people to play a five-on-five pickup game. Half of them were fighting and the other half were watching TV to see what's going on."

Most European athletes, like Rimac and Staub, have English training before they move to the United States. They also are required to pass an English language competency test before they can attend college.

But athletes say when they are thrown into a new culture and new surroundings, it can be difficult for them to carry on a conversation or study in English.

"The language barrier was there for the first two weeks, because I'm not used to having to speak so much English," Staub said. "Now after almost three months, it's no problem at all for me."

REGGIE GRANT, THE INDEPENDENT FLORIDA ALLIGATOR, U. OF FLORIDA

Anthony Nesty, a native of Surname, won a gold medal in the 100-meter butterfly at the 1988 Summer Olympics. After a hero's welcome, Nesty returned to the U.S. to be a Gator.

Homesickness also can be a problem. Although many athletes say they don't miss life in their own countries, U. of Florida swimmer Anthony Nesty said he often feels a twinge when he goes home to his native Surname, a country in northern South America.

Nesty brought his country home a gold medal in the 100-meter butterfly from the 1988 Summer Olympics.

"When I was a junior (in high school) and I'd go home for Christmas and I'd come back, I had a real hard time going back (to the United States)," Nesty said.

Athletes like Nesty who are successful early on may be well-known before they decide to come to the U.S. Once they arrive, foreign athletes must spend time with dozens of people they don't know and may not yet understand.

But Staub said her teammates provided opportunities for her to speak English and were patient with her progress.

Still, Martti Kuisma, a Gator basketball player from Finland, said sometimes Americans with good intentions try to be too nice, yet can't keep their promises.

"Sometimes you can't trust them," Kuisma said. "You can ask them a favor and they say they'll do it, but then they don't."

In all, most athletes seem happy with their roles as student athletes.

U. of Georigia track coach John Mitchell said one of his American athletes went to England to visit her teammate over the summer. Also at Georgia, a cross-country runner from Iceland is dating a teammate from St. Louis.

"I don't think there's any question that these kids are developing friendships that will last a lifetime," Mitchell said.

Student Body Briefly

It's in the hole... To the doubting Thomases, his friends and a sports announcer, he's somewhere between a fool, Walter Mitty and a hallowed herd animal. No matter, because for the record, The Guinness Book of World Records proclaims him the World's Fastest Golfer. Eric Freeman, a second-year Northwestern U. student, received confirmation this year that he broke the record of a Canadian man for the most holes played in a 12-hour period. What would possess a man to average a hole of golf every 1.67 minutes for a total of 429 holes – in just a half day? Enter a confessed eccentric. "You're only 21 once. I didn't go out looking for a record to break. I just love golf and wanted to do something I could remember for the rest of my life," Freeman said. After 10 hours, 10 pairs of gloves, a pulled muscle and sore hands, the cynics ate their words and the course swallowed up the 392 balls that it took to break the record. ■ Lydia Rebac, The Daily Northwestern, Northwestern U.

Have no fear... The U. of Kansas Medical Center is offering treatment for people who suffer from panic attacks and agoraphobia. Agoraphobia is the irrational fear of leaving home. "These people have anxiety related to a specific type of situation," said Fowler Jones, an associate professor who works at the U. of Kansas Med Center. "Agoraphobia and panic attacks are not something that can be overcome by will power alone." ■ Kerri Gottschalk, The Daily Kansan, U. of Kansas.

'Free Rides' preaches natural highs to readers

BY LANA G. SCHULTZ
Daily Cougar, U. of Houston

You already know how to get high.

"You've simply allowed your mind to convince you that you forgot," write Douglas Rushkoff and Patrick Wells in their new book Free Rides: How to Get High Without Drugs.

In fact, some sociologists maintain that getting high and transcending one's current reality is, as Aldous Huxley put it, "one of the principal appetites of the soul."

However, expanding one's consciousness need not be a psychedelic scene with modern Orpheus incarnations eating acid like jellybeans.

Nonchemical highs are almost invariably more enjoyable, longer lasting and of greater benefit to one's quality of life, said Rushkoff and Wells.

And the book suggestions won't land you in the hoosegow and your car on the sheriff's auction block.

The book's promoters claim Free Rides is the first-ever survey of techniques to expand consciousness through healthy and constructive methods. And, as an added bonus, the authors managed to steer clear of most New Age mumbo jumbo.

> "To write Free Rides, I had to sift through more crap than one might imagine is out there."
> — Douglas Rushkoff

"To write Free Rides, I had to sift through more crap than one might imagine is out there," said Rushkoff, a political editor of Expose magazine.

"I floated, put on goggles, stared at television screens and tried some pretty dangerous things, too. For every ten con artists, there is one truly dedicated, spiritual person, hoping to design a significant method of exploring human experience."

Unlike a chemical high, which is compared to riding a lift, the authors liken getting high on your own, without drugs, to climbing a mountain.

"Instead of looking out on the mountain from a chair dangling from a wire that someone else erected, you stand on the face of the mountain on your own two feet."

Techniques discussed in the book range from cheap and relatively easy – rhythmic breathing, aerobics and tantric sex – to more expensive and daring – electromagnetic stimulation, brain machines and skydiving.

One of the more way-out methods, one that requires a bit of training and supervision, is the Sufi Whirling Dervish dances.

The hypnotic spinning leaves the dancer feeling like a pure channel of energy, the book says.

"The trick with any of the techniques in this chapter is to stay conscious," they write.

"Instead of altering your mind to see the everyday world differently, you leave the mind alone and go into different space."

AND ON THE EIGHTH DAY, WE BULLDOZED IT.

The oldest rainforests date back to the time of the dinosaurs, 100 million years ago. Today they offer the last refuge for half of all the plant and animal species on earth.

But how much time do rainforests have left?

Each day, fifty thousand acres of rainforests are bulldozed, burned, degraded, destroyed. At this rate, the last traces of paradise will be gone in a single human lifespan.

A miracle of creation wiped out, at horrendous cost to our environment.

What can you do to save the last rainforests on earth?

You can support activists in more than a dozen nations fighting to conserve the splendid variety of living things which depend on these endangered environments.

Jaguars, orchids, boas, birds not to mention 200 million people.

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

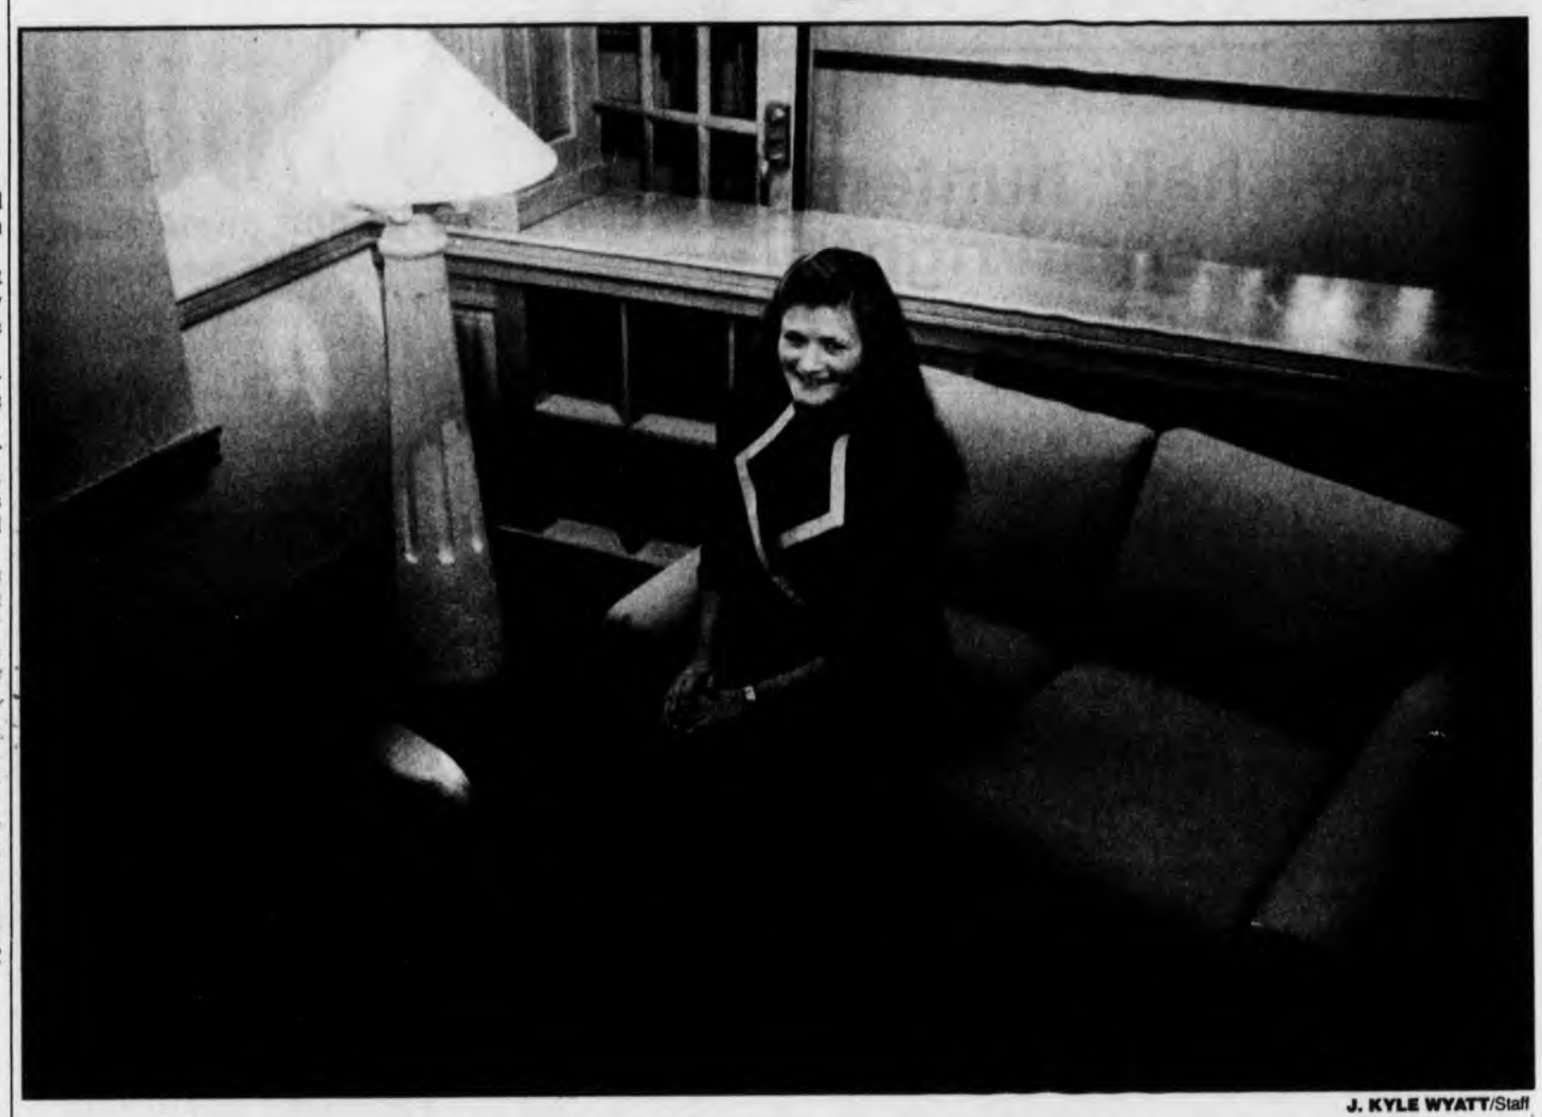
But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.



"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for

Ousting Fulcher a lose-lose situation

Controversy heightened racial tensions at KU

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The ousting of Darren Fulcher as University of Kansas student body president appears to be a lose-lose situation.

"No one won," said Kristin Lange, KU student senator.

Lange said racial tensions have been exacerbated and the senate's reputation harmed.

"Now there's this on-going rift. There's always been one between the black and white communities — now it's just worse," she said. "And senate may end up with a bad name because of this."

Fulcher was removed from office Dec. 4, nearly three months after KU's Student Senate voted to oust him. An appeal caused the delay. After the senate's vote, Fulcher appealed the motion to KU's Judicial Board on the premise that the senate had no authority to remove him.

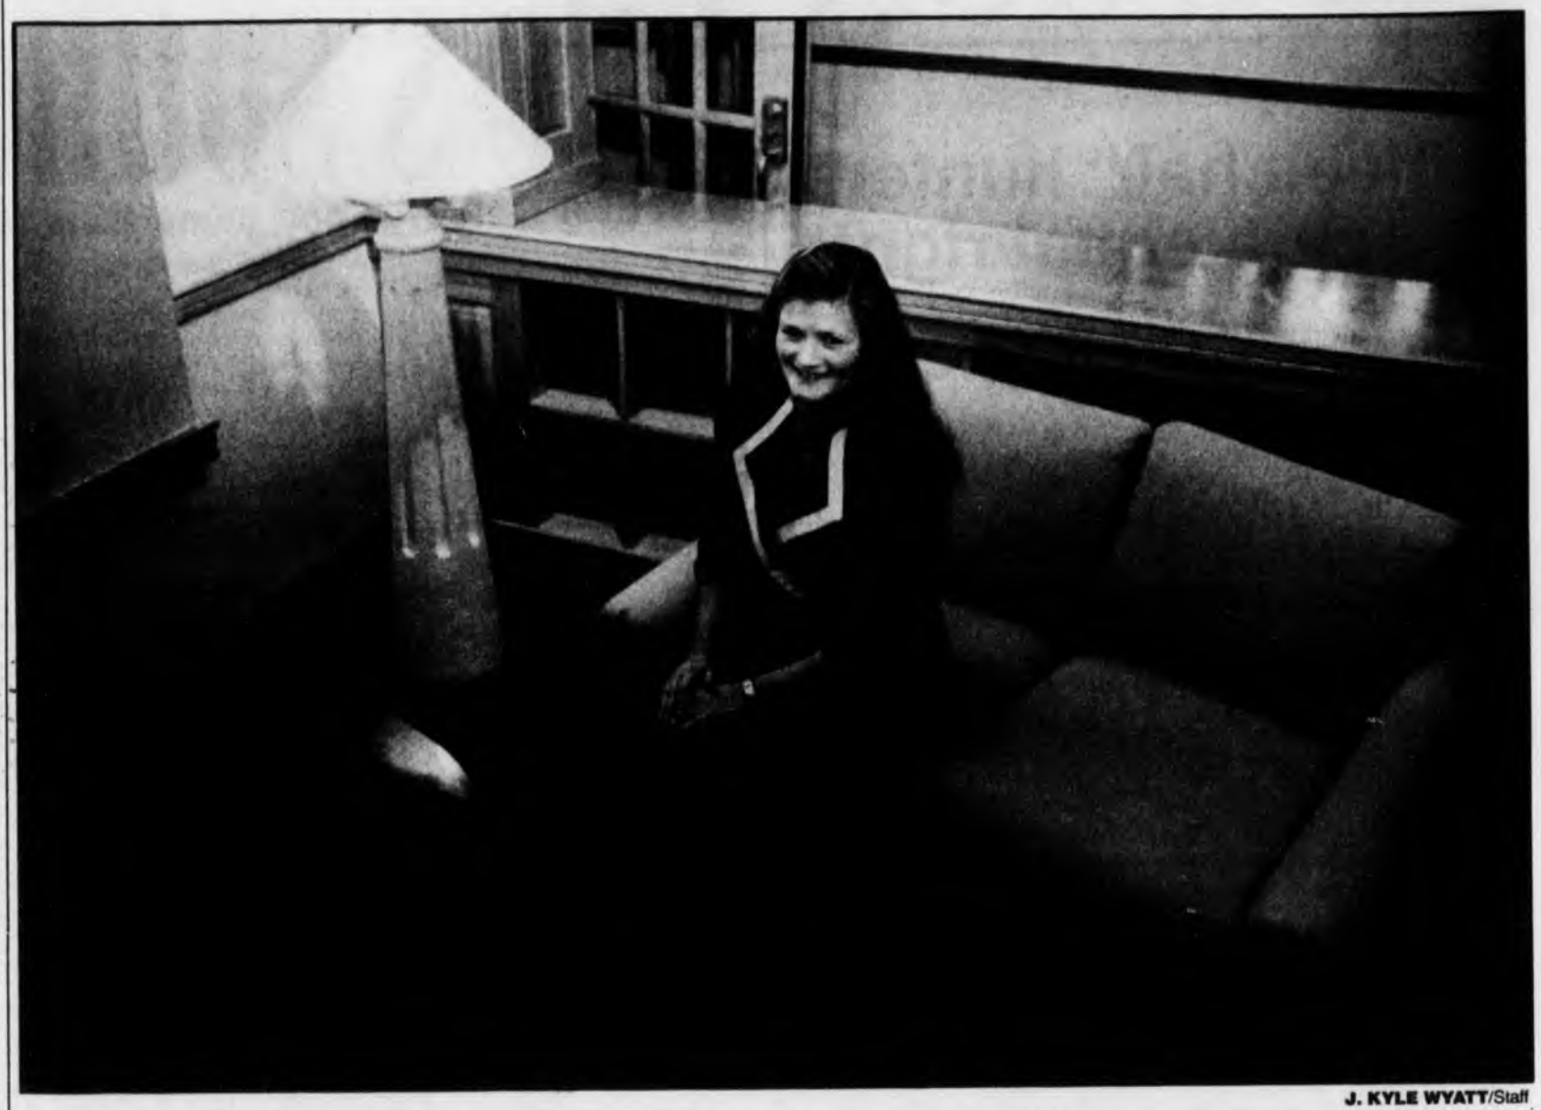
But the board did not agree and recently upheld the senate's motion to oust him.

The removal stems from an incident in February in which Fulcher allegedly grabbed a former girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face.

Fulcher's Judicial Board representative, James LaSalle, said the board's decision was wrong.

"They just rubber stamped the other side's argument 100 percent," he said. "It seems like they decided the day we appealed. I'm mad and disappointed in the decision."

LaSalle said what angered him the most was the short amount of time the board needed to make the decision.



"They decided one hour after the trial, which to me isn't enough time to consider all of the issues presented. It's not enough time to come out with a fair and thoughtful ruling," he said.

Lange said, however, that the decision was the best possible outcome.

"I was happy it was decided in our favor and happy it was over," she said. "But I, personally, could not be happy no matter what the decision was. I don't look at it as a win for Recycling this can reduces litter, saves energy and provides important income for nonprofit groups and others. So pitch in, recycle and help keep America clean.

If 250,000 people recycled one can per day, we could save the energy equivalent of 3.5 million gallons of gas a year.

You can power your TV for 3 hours with the energy saved by recycling a single can.

Today, the energy saved from recycling aluminum cans is enough to power the city of Boston for one full year!

At Anheuser-Busch, we're saving precious resources and energy by recycling nearly as much aluminum as we use. In 1978, we established the Container Recovery Corporation – the world's largest recycler of aluminum cans. And since then, we've recycled over two billion pounds of aluminum– over fourteen billion cans last year alone. And this is only one of the many steps we've taken over the last hundred years to help eliminate the solid waste and litter problems that face our nation. We believe that the world we all share is only given to us in trust. And we're trusted to preserve it for every generation to come.

Mideast peace talks trudge along

After 3 hours Israel and Syria agree to meet again

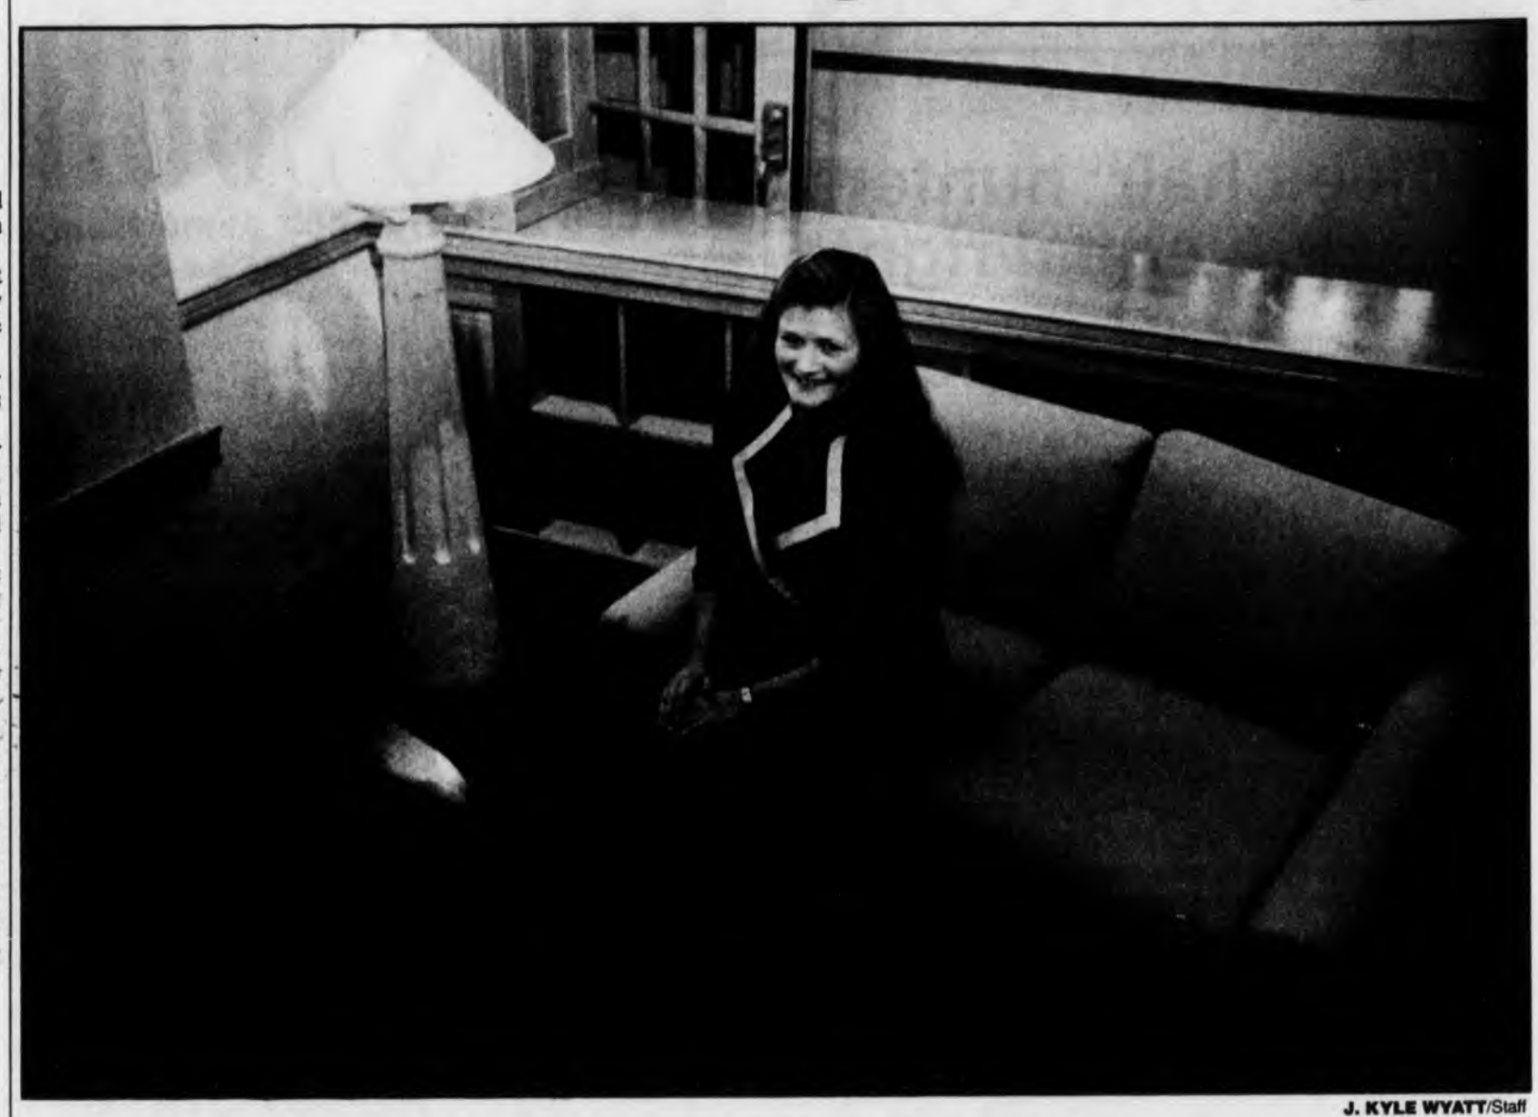
By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Israel and Syria sounded hopeful notes at the opening of Mideast peace talks Tuesday, but after a three-hour exchange they could agree only to meet another day.

Separately, Israeli-Palestinian negotiations hit a quick impasse over Palestinian representation.

The heads of the Israeli and joint Palestinian-Jordanian delegations met twice during the day but made no headway over the Palestinians' demand for independent talks with the Israelis.

"It's like a cracked record," said a Palestinian official. "We're all repeating the same thing but we have not broken the ice."



"The atmosphere was, I think, positive," Israeli negotiator Elyakim Rubinstein said at day's end. He said differences remain, but, "I think we narrowed the gap. I believe the gap is bridgeable."

Symbolic of their disagreement, the two sides met only in a State Department corridor. They did not go into the negotiations room set aside for them, because that would require a decision on whether the Palestinians could go in alone, or only with Jordanians.

Jordanian negotiator Abdul Salam Majali said the talks involved "no substance whatsoever."

Department of Housing and Dining Services relies on student's expertise

Before the Department of Housing and Dining Services plans any repairs or replacements, it consults Patience Cozadd, the only part-time, student interior designer in the Big Eight.

Cozadd, senior in interior design, has been the interior design consultant for the housing department since her freshman year in 1987.

"I don't know of any other Big Eight schools that use students in this capacity," said Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent of the Department of Housing and Dining Services. "For example, KU has a full-time, professional interior designer."

Cozadd's job involves balancing an area's durability, spatial relationships and warmth as expressed by color to enhance University living comfort. Within the constraints of a limited budget, she orders furniture, carpet and paint from vendors and manufacturers.

Though Cozadd has earned money and four internship credits for her curriculum, she said the work experience is the most valuable part of her job.

"I'm going to be affiliated with a lot of things that I wouldn't have been if I just went to school," she said. "I know the bid process well and how the state runs."

Cozadd said the selection and order of furniture for the summer 1990 renovation of Van Zile Hall and the selection of furniture and carpeting for this year's renovation of William's Place, Building F of Jardine Terrace, are her two most extensive interior design projects.

Since the student interior design program began in 1973, Cozadd has provided the most initiative and completed more projects than her predecessors, Wiley said.

The housing department requires Cozadd to work between 12 and 30 hours a week. She has the option to work full time in the summer.

Another benefit Cozadd said she derived from working for the housing department was the social interaction.

"When I first came to the University, I was taking night classes and working full time during the day," she said

"This way I get to meet a bunch of people who I wouldn't normally have had the chance to," She said. "I see different perspectives and that has enabled me to broaden my own horizons."

Wiley said Cozadd's strong work ethic, determination and personality will make her an excellent employee.

"We almost look at her as a full-time employee, and I have to remind some of the administration that, OK, she made a little mistake," Wiley said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

OPINION

EDITORIALS

Wheelchair hunters deserve equal rights

Physically disabled hunters in Kansas can hunt in manual wheelchairs but not in electric wheelchairs.

How dumb.

Should hunters be prevented from hunting on public land just because they have handicaps and use electric wheelchairs rather than manual models?

What is the big deal, anyway? The hunters are most likely not to go joyriding in the fields and tear them up. It would be easier on the fields because hunters seem more likely to get stuck in manual wheelchairs than electric ones.

Kansas seems to have some oddities on the law books, and this farce ranks right up near the top.

In Kansas, electric wheelchairs are considered motorized vehicles, so people operating them are operating motorized vehicles. If these wheelchairs are technically considered motorized vehicles, they should meet the vehicle codes as well. Imagine a wheelchair with blinkers, headlights, seat belts and a license-toting driver as well.

Two local men are taking action to get this ridiculous law changed, and they should be encouraged. Even with their physical disabilities, they are trying to lead normal lives. They are trying to do what they enjoy.

The state's logic behind this law is weak and makes it difficult for the physically disabled to enjoy the sport of hunting just because they are handicapped.

Jim Auld, one of the men fighting to get the law changed, says it best: "I can get around. It's the laws themselves that are my handicap."

Holidays are for remembrance

It seems the holiday season means cliches, materialism and hype these days.

Christmas may not mean the birth of the Christ child to everyone — there are other religious celebrations, and there are some whose true meaning of Christmas isn't religious at all.

But, to everyone who celebrates the season, the holidays are supposed to be about peace, giving and good will.

While many students will cruise home after their last final to spend time with family, see old friends, eat hearty meals and give and receive gifts, not everyone is so lucky.

On your way out of town, remember an overworked professor, an international student who can't go home for the holidays or a residence hall staff member who has to stay an extra day to close the hall.

When you get home, remember your grandparents, an old friend you haven't seen for a few years, a high school teacher who really helped you out and the poor and homeless in your hometown who won't be getting any presents or turkey dinner on Dec. 25.

Donate an old jacket to a clothing drive or some canned goods to a food bank, make a couple phone calls or mail a greeting card or two. Say a prayer or just take a minute to be aware.

Depression and suicide increase every year during the holiday months. Remembering those around you can make the holidays a little happier for everyone.

Life's sound of music

Beautiful melodies can come from improvising in the chaos around us

ERIC BECKER

It's tough to put a finger on some things. Sometimes it's not clear why something appeals to you.

It can happen with a song. Ever have a song (or even a part of a song) that you play over and over again in your room without really knowing why you like it?

This often happens to me. There's something magical in music. It creates an order, a harmony that is absent in the kind of sound we call "noise."

In some music, improvisation — random, spur-of-the-moment creation of the song, or at least part of the song — can be especially rewarding. In such music, the order comes from the chaos, or the possibility of chaos, the musician embraces. By dancing with chaos, a musician can create the order upon which his or her music depends.

To some extent, improvisation is the spice of life. We trip and fall and stumble about amongst the disharmony that surrounds us. But sometimes things come together. Sometimes things make sense. Once in a while, the chaos manifests itself in a melody. Beautiful and often unexpected, these tunes make flirting with chaos worthwhile. These unexpected pleasures help make life worth living.

It's hard to put a finger on some things. But with the semester coming to a close, it seems that improvisation is the thing (from a student's perspective) that makes the academic world work.

Who could survive a semester without the potential for impromptu encounters the academic community offers? Who would seek a college education if it consisted only of classes? And even if someone would, what would such an education be worth without the improvisation of college life?

A residence hall T-shirt I once saw said something like, "We're not here just to learn from books. We're here to learn from life."

There is no doubt that we all need an underlying order of some kind. For students, classes can provide a constructive backbone of order. During this previous semester, class loads have given all of our lives a needed and worthwhile structure.

But just as worthwhile are the quick study breaks, the dates, the movies and the concerts — all of the extracurricular activities that give our lives the balance of work and play we must maintain to remain healthy.

Life is about people, and perhaps few places are better for getting to know people than a college campus. Our education here at K-State will not be complete with the completion of a classroom curriculum. We are ultimately learning from life as well as from our professors. And life may be the hardest course in which we ever enroll.

The music drones on. Final examinations, term papers and projects approach. But maybe there's still time for a quick experiment in improvisation. Once in a while it happens, and all you need to do is let it carry you and enjoy the melody in the chaos from which it comes.

Public education gets no respect

GALE HAMMERSCHMIDT GUEST

Electing new leaders may be only solution

Gale Hammerschmidt is a sophomore in business.

While I was sitting in class the other day, I heard it again. I don't know how many times I have heard it, but it has been too many to count.

"What am I talking about?" you ask.

Well, I am talking about the phrase that goes something like this: "If you had any kind of class like this in high school, you should be familiar with what I am talking about."

I hear this from my instructors all the time. The problem is, I did take the classes that are being referred to in high school, and I have no idea of what the instructor is talking about.

This causes me to wonder about a few things. I was a B student in high school. Therefore, it would seem appropriate that I remember some of the things that I was supposed to have been taught. This, then, causes me to wonder why I don't remember these things, or why I was never taught them at all. This also causes me to wonder about the condition of public schools in Kansas today.

"If you had any kind of class like this in high school, you should be familiar with what I am talking about."

– University professors

Upon looking into this subject for a recent speech I did, I discovered a few things. Gov. Joan Finney has recently vetoed a bill that would have provided extra funds for the schools, and she has blamed the recent problem of high property taxes on the school boards around Kansas.

To me, this seems crazy. Gov. Finney should be able to recognize that good schools can cause many, many benefits for the future of this state. Gov. Finney should also be able to recognize that the public schools in Kansas are going to continue to deteriorate unless something is done.

Another thing that I discovered in the research I did deals with the mighty President Bush. Good old Mr. Bush — he'll get us straightened out. After all, he is the education president. Wrong.

President Bush is doing little to live up to his name of the "education president," and people need to know this. Virginia Gov. Doug Wilder has been quoted as saying, "President Bush is the education president who doesn't exist."

Now that these things have been established, I must now try to come to some kind of conclusion. The obvious conclusion here is that the mighty leaders of our state and country don't seem to care about our public school system. It seems the only thing we can do in this situation is try to get these pesky government officials out of office and get someone who actually does care about the future of America.

When this is done, and the public schools once again become functional, then, possibly, we could see some benefits to spending 12 years of our lives in a school system that will actually teach us things that can be used later in life.

LETTERS

Just Guys not such a great idea after all

Editor,

How dare you! How dare you chop three of the eight sentences that I wrote in a letter to the editor that was published in the Dec. 9 Collegian! How dare you give it the title, "Just Guys great idea," which was the exact opposite of what I wanted to convey.

How dare you not even attempt to call the number written on the submitted letter to see if I still wanted it to be printed after all the sarcasm had been removed. How dare you use the word "penis" in the article "Just Guys able to talk openly" in the Dec. 4 Collegian and not let me use the words "penis," "vagina" and "testicles" in my letter.

I realize that space and clarity dictate the submissions be edited. However, if a significant change is to be made in a submission, other than in simple grammar or spelling, either the person should be consulted, or the submission should not be printed. Anything less than that courtesy ranges from laziness to downright distortion.

Eric Patterson
Sophomore
in business administration

With only two Collegian publication dates remaining this semester, it will be impossible to publish all of the letters we have received. We trust you will understand and encourage you to send letters next semester and in future semesters.

Party, safety tips for the holiday season shared

Awareness of drinking, driving increased despite high numbers of gatherings

CARY HASSELL
Collegian Reporter

Sixty-one people die each day in alcohol-related vehicle accidents in the United States.

Many people think the holiday season is a time when more accidents and deaths occur. Although there may be more parties and gatherings where alcohol is available, the awareness of drinking and not driving has been greatly increased. The holiday season on the whole is not always the danger time.

William Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services, counsels students who think they may have a problem with drinking.

"Over the holidays, education about drinking and driving, advertising, sobriety check points and field sobriety tests are used to a higher degree during the holidays to try and prevent alcohol-related tragedies," Arck said.

In 1990, 466 people were arrested for DUIs in Manhattan, with a 97-percent conviction rate.

For the 1990 fall semester alone, 45 K-State students were arrested for DUIs.

"Just because a person gets a DUI, doesn't necessarily mean you're an alcoholic," Arck said. "It's not just the thugs and drunks that get pulled over."

In 1982, President Ronald Reagan signed the first proclamation designating the second week in December as National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week.

Every year thereafter, Congress has passed a resolution and the president issued a proclamation declaring impaired driving a serious public health and safety problem.

From 1982 to 1989, 189,000 Americans lost their lives in alcohol-related traffic crashes. This is equal to one death every 22 minutes around the clock in those eight years.

With the holiday season here, Students Against Drunk Driving have a few tips for people who are hosting parties.

Provide food or snacks throughout the entire evening, food soaks up some alcohol that would have been ingested into the body. Always have non-alcoholic beverages available for designated drivers and people who don't drink. Don't challenge people who are already drinking by telling everyone to drink up, because there is alcohol left over. Cut-off the alcohol at a certain time to allow people who have been drinking to decide if he or she is in any condition to drive.

And one final important tip, if a person is going to throw a party, always have a way for people who have been drinking to get home safely without them having to drive.

Cheerleader selection procedures reviewed

Policies not changed much, despite complaints

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

The procedures for selecting K-State cheerleaders have been reviewed and documented in response to concerns earlier this semester regarding selection policies.

Scott Johnson, cheerleader adviser and assistant instructor of animal science and industry, said he submitted the procedures previously used to his supervisor, Chris Peterson, associate athletic director.

Johnson said the procedures were not changed substantially.

"We haven't really changed anything, and I don't see any major changes happening," Johnson said. "The only suggestion that has been made is that I not be one of the actual judges."

Johnson said even this suggestion had not been finalized.

Currently, Johnson said, the cheerleader selections are made on the basis of recommendations from a panel of judges. He said he did not know of any case when the recommendation was not taken.

Typical judges are experts in gymnastics or dance, or former K-State cheerleaders. The ideal judge is someone who has worked with the K-State program or with the national organization to which the K-State cheerleaders belong, he said.

Peterson said the basic change is not in the procedure, but that it will now be documented.

"This is the first time for documentation of the procedure," Peterson said. "This is not intended to be a watchdog procedure over Scott. It is just to eliminate future problems by actually putting the policy on paper."

Cheerleaders are selected on the basis of four or five criteria, the statement said. Men are chosen on general appearance, jumps/kicks/tumbling, fight song and partner stunts. Women are chosen on the same four, as well as an additional dance category.

The next cheerleading tryouts will be in April.

Heat reduced during break

Faculty members prepare for chilly working conditions

STEPHANIE WATSON
Collegian Reporter

Faculty members planning to work over the holidays may have to prepare for some chilly working conditions.

After finals are over, any building that has not indicated an interest in keeping its heat maintained will have its thermostat reduced, assistant vice president for facilities, Ed Rice, said.

The reduction of temperature has always been done in order to conserve energy, Rice said.

The thermostat reduction begins the week of Dec. 23 and ends Jan. 1.

Jack Watson, director of building maintenance, said if a department has made a request to leave the heat on, it will remain on.

"We have already received several letters from department heads asking to have the heat left at a higher level," he said.

Watson said it is very important to conserve energy, and this is one way the University can help out.

"It would be absolutely foolish to leave all of the buildings heated at full capacity," Watson said. "It would be a waste of energy."

Rice said there are a number of people who take the opportunity to do research work and projects over break, and would need the thermostat left at its normal level.

Watson said there are some buildings on campus that have to have the whole building heated just to heat one room.

"An example is Kedzie Hall," Watson said. "Since there is only one master valve the whole unit has to be turned on for the maintenance of one room."

But not all buildings are requesting warm working conditions.

"The computer rooms are actually wanting the air conditioning left on," Watson said.

body majored in it — people tend to be more loyal to their college."

Richard Morse, co-chair of the University libraries project, said contributions to the libraries are a result of the student emphasis on the project.

"Starting with the sit-in, the library has attracted much attention," he said. "It's very admirable for the students to develop a five-year program when most of them won't be here to see the completion of it."

The art museum also does not have constituency support, though the campaign has raised 74 percent of its $4 million goal.

"The art museum was the most difficult to raise money for," Moore said. "We're very pleased in its progress."

Moore said the building and placing of the museum is in the planning stages.

Ruth Ann Wefald, chair of area directors for the museum project, said finding contributors for the museum was a matter of getting people involved.

Salaries are out of hand

Does anyone remember when Nolan Ryan became the first major league free agent to sign a $1-million contract? It doesn't seem that long ago, but oh, how things have changed.

In the past decade, we have seen baseball's top salaries pushed higher than the high score on a video game that's been played for too long. It has just become automatic. It doesn't really matter who you are. If your contract is up, you will become the highest paid player in baseball.

An uproar followed the Houston Astros' signing of Ryan for the 1980 season. During the 1970s, as a member of the California Angels, Ryan dominated games, but he failed to win many of them. He was accused of being a .500 pitcher who did not deserve to be the highest paid player in the league. Steve Carlton, Tom Seaver and Jim Palmer were better pitchers and should have ranked ahead of Ryan on the pay scale, it was argued.

Such was the old-fashioned, wage-earning rationale of the day. If you were the best, you were rewarded with the most, and the system made sure it stayed that way.

Prior to the inception of free agency, players renegotiated their contracts annually, receiving in accordance to how they stacked up against others in the league. In order to earn a salary comparable to that of another individual, the numbers you produced on the field had to warrant it.

The salaries handed out to free agents, however, have become irrational. A list of the highest paid players does not read like the results of MVP balloting, but like a chronological list of signings.

The first to leap past more deserving players on the pay scale was Joe Carter who became the highest paid player in baseball when he signed with San Diego in the late 1980s. Since then, Kirby Puckett, Don Mattingly, Jose Canseco and Roger Clemens each had brief stints at the top.

The latest to take his place atop the list is the New York Mets newest millionaire, Bobby Bonilla. Last week, the star outfielder of the Pittsburgh Pirates landed a contract worth $5.8 million per year, sailing past Clemens' $5.38 million. Bonilla is a fine player, but 18 home runs and 100 RBIs don't place him ahead of the pack.

Unlike some who occupied the top spot for only a matter of days until another player was granted a higher salary, Bonilla will probably remain at the top of the pay scale until next season. Like the Royals' recent acquisition, Wally Joyner, who had to settle for a paltry $4.2 million, the other free agents seeking contracts this winter probably won't challenge Bonilla's.

But while the remaining free agents like Danny Tartabull of the Royals won't move into the top spot, they will still leap into company they don't belong in. Does Tartabull deserve more than Puckett or Canseco? No, but he'll probably get it.

No one will top Bonilla's salary this season, but look out next winter. Barry Bonds and Cal Ripken will make the $6-million mark look like a hitchhiker on the autobahn.

Bonds and Ripken are great players. They deserve to rank at or near the top of the salary scale. Never mind whether or not anyone actually deserves the kind of money they will receive. That argument is pointless.

The alarming fact is that baseball is recklessly awarding progressively higher salaries to each player that comes along. On the whole, salaries are not being dictated by merit, but by timing.

Players today simply rationalize their salaries by saying, "His contract doesn't run out until 1992."

Hogs put clamps on Cats

Arkansas bothers K-State's offense in 70-59 victory

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Frantic.

The word aptly describes K-State's play on the offensive end of the floor in Tuesday night's 70-59 loss to 19th-ranked Arkansas in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We just didn't take our time and finish plays," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "We talked about it in every timeout, but just couldn't get a handle on it."

Indeed, the Cats' grasp of the handle was lacking from the onset.

Arkansas, 5-2, stormed from the gates, moving to a 10-1 lead before the game was four minutes old. The Razorbacks held that early lead all night long.

And K-State's inability to get over the hump was due in large part to a dismal shooting effort.

The Cats shot just 30.6 percent from the floor in the opening 20 minutes and just 31.7 percent for the game.

Those percentages were low, Altman and players said, because the team failed to establish a consistent offensive rhythm.

"I was just too eager and going too fast," said Ski Jones, who led K-State with 12 points. "That's just not the way I normally play."

Altman said the woes that Jones faced were ones that the entire team battled all night.

"Offensively we were very sped up," Altman said. "Their defense was a part of it, but we just got sped up. The team was very impatient."

Center John Rettiger, who worked hard in his 25 minutes to limit Razorback center Oliver Miller to just six rebounds, took Altman's analysis a step further.

"As a team, we've got to realize we've got a lot of great shooters," he said. "But our great shooters are great shooters only when we swing the ball and get less-contested shots.

"We've got to trust in the offense and run it."

K-State failed to get into the offense early because of one major factor, Altman said.

"They (K-State players) were charged a lot more than they've been," he said. "The adrenaline was flowing a bit quicker."

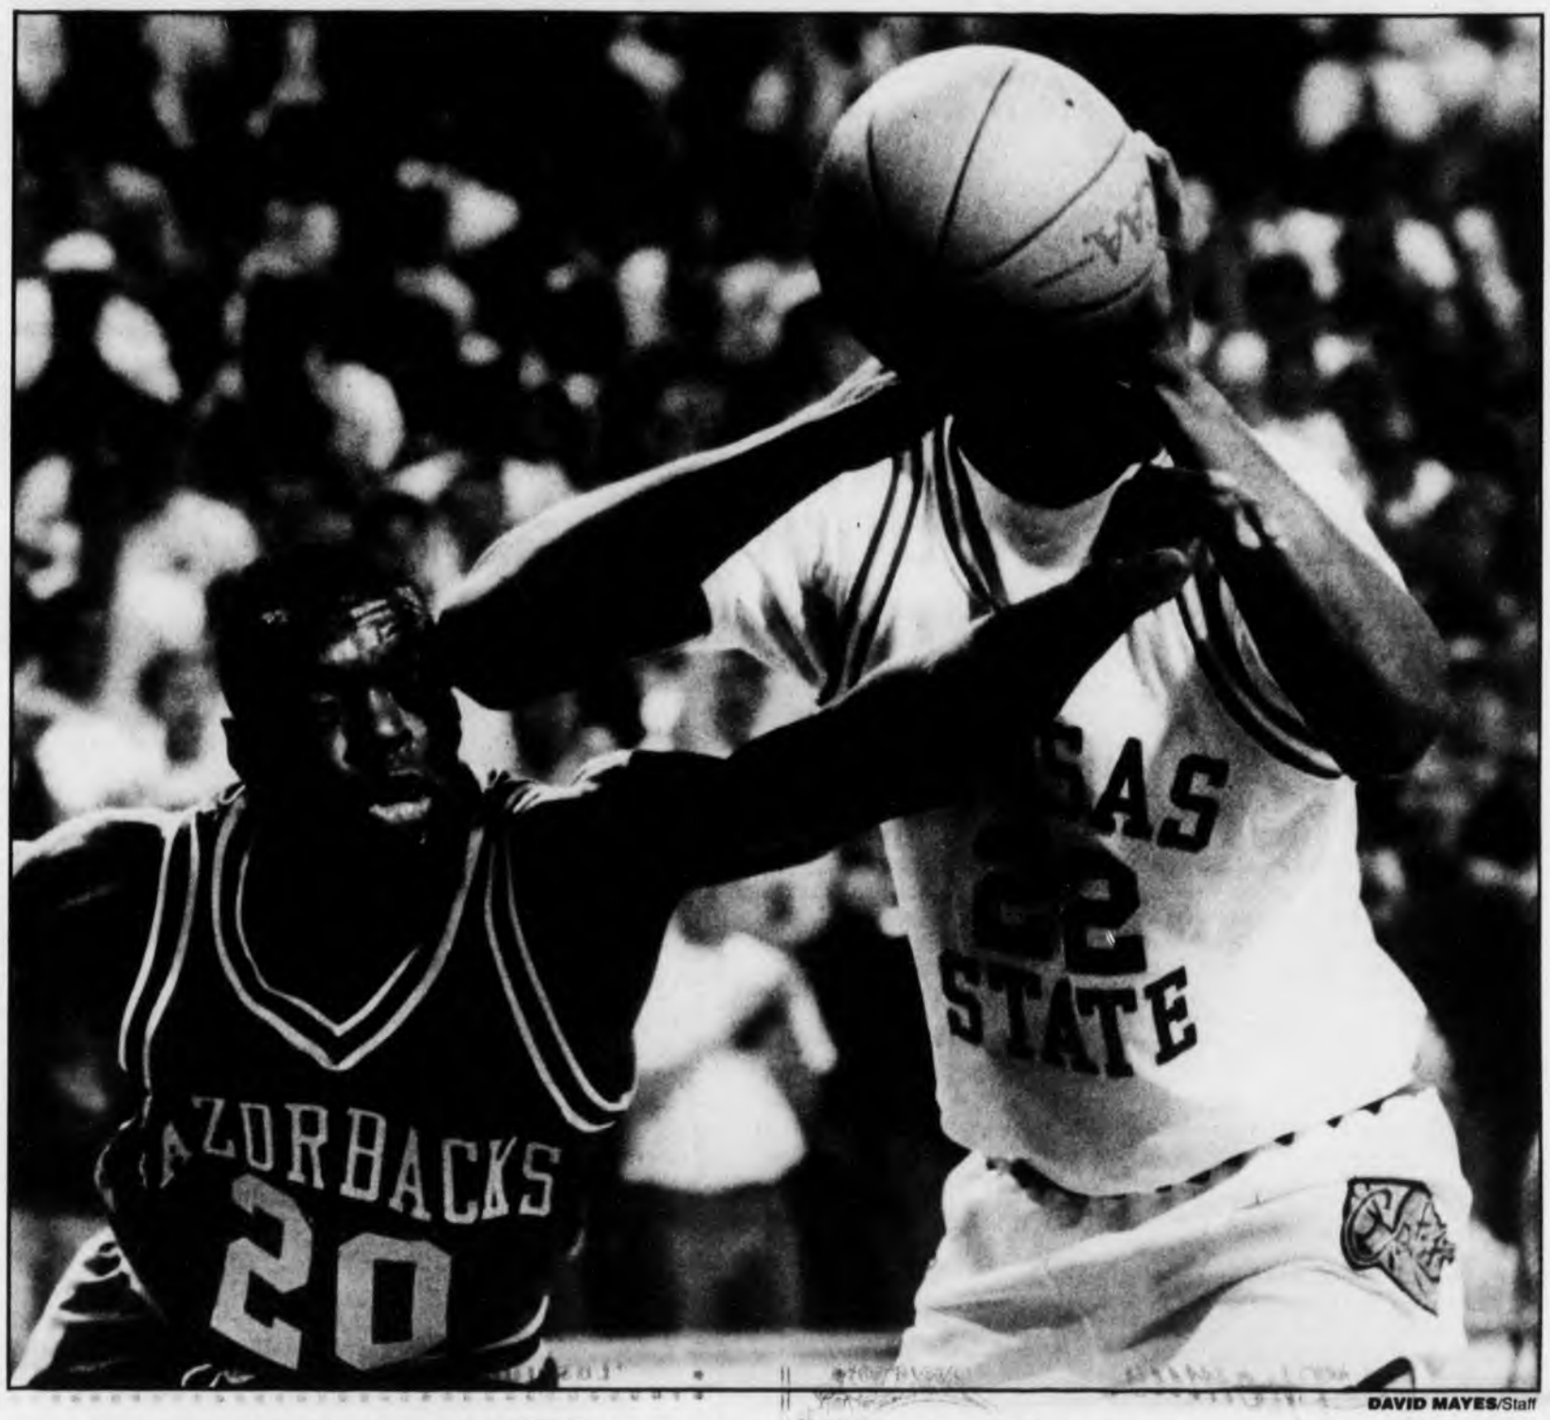
And that adrenaline definitely played a role — and a negative one, from a K-State standpoint.

One of the Wildcats' normally potent offensive weapons — guard Gaylon Nickerson — fired blanks most of the night. His 3-of-11 first-half shooting effort epitomized the night for the team.

"I was pressing pretty hard," said the junior transfer, who finished the game with eight points. "A lot of times, my shots were contested, but there were other times I shot the ball and I knew almost right away that I should have passed it off."

Nickerson said the early 10-1 deficit forced the Cats into playing a game not suited to a group of players still learning about each other.

"This being a team with a lot of new players, we probably felt like we'd be able to come back all of a sudden," he said. "We wanted to hurry up, get ahead and take it out."



That dream never became a reality, partially because the Razorbacks took a page from an old K-State playbook and played a more deliberate style than what Altman and his players had expected.

"They enjoy scoring, so we had to take the air out of the ball," said Arkansas coach Nolan Richardson, who was hit above the eye with ice thrown from the student section during a heated moment in the first half. The incident led to a stoppage of play and a warning to the crowd.

"This is my first time in many years of coaching that I've walked on the floor and was afraid we might be blown out," he said.

But if anyone was on the verge of being blown out it was K-State, now 3-1. Arkansas led by as many as 16,

Miller, Mayberry lead way

Seniors promised strong comeback after loss to Mizzou

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

If the Arkansas Razorbacks missed Todd Day in their loss to Missouri Saturday, two other seniors made them forget him — at least for a night.

Two leaders of the squad that reached the Elite Eight last season stepped forward to atone for the 87-76 loss to the Tigers on the Razorbacks' home floor. All-American point guard Lee Mayberry and mammoth center Oliver Miller carried the team past the Wildcats and a hostile enemy crowd.

On an opponent's court for the first time since the loss of their team leader, the All-America senior Day, who is serving a disciplinary suspension until Jan. 2, Miller and Mayberry produced to thwart K-State rallies down the stretch.

"That's what a senior is all about," Arkansas coach Nolan Richardson said. "I challenged them on the way up here and said that this is the time that they've got to show what they're made of. The young guys can't do it without leadership."

That leadership came in the form of Mayberry, who provided 40 minutes of defensive hustle and steady direction on offense. Mayberry countered K-State's 3-point attack by hitting two of his three attempts from the arc. He finished with 14 points and five assists, earning praise from Richardson.

"Lee Mayberry was the iron man out there tonight," Richardson said. "He's just a workaholic. He'll play 40 minutes, or he'll play 50 minutes — whatever it takes to win.

"That's what I heard him tell the kids: 'You've got to be ready to do whatever it takes to win.'"

Greeted by a hostile reception from Wildcat fans, Miller returned the sentiment by squashing K-State's inside threat. His weight problems, which received a barrage of jeers from the crowd, did not keep Miller from knocking down 18 points and blocking five shots to dominate the paint for the second consecutive meeting between the two schools.

"A lot of people have been talking

Lady Cats hope home is where the wins are

DAVID SVOBODA

Maybe a little home cookin' will be just the remedy the Lady Cats need.

That's the hope of K-State players and coaches, as the squad takes the Bramlage Coliseum floor at 7 tonight for a non-conference tilt with Southwest Missouri State.

The Lady Cats, 1-4, picked up their lone win of the season in Bramlage on Dec. 3 when they downed Oral Roberts, 66-64.

SMSU enters the game with a record of 3-1. The Lady Bears are led by Tonya Baucom, who is averaging 14.8 points and 8.5 rebounds a contest.

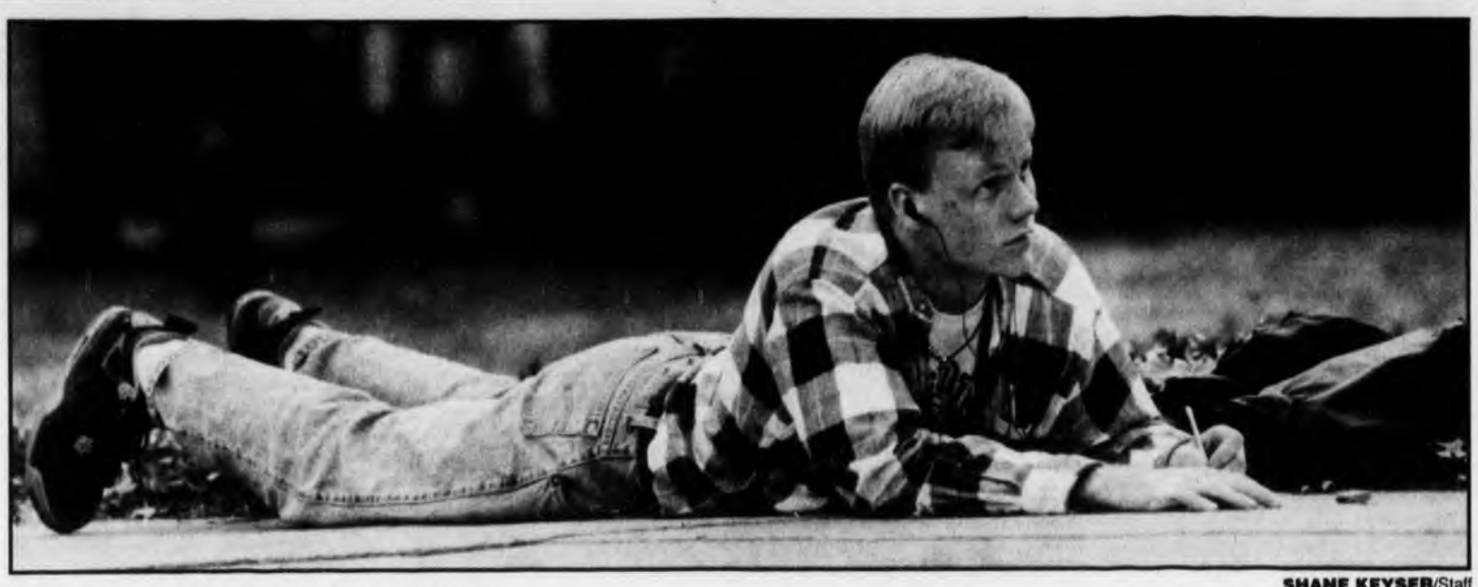
Coach Susan Yow has a great deal of respect for the Lady Bear defense.

"Southwest Missouri State will be the best defensive team we have faced this season," she said. "They are tenacious on defense."

K-State ran into a pair of tenacious foes this past weekend, finishing fourth in the four-team NIU/GTE Fastbreak Fest in DeKalb, Ill. Three of the four K-State losses on the young season have come in the state of Illinois, including the season-opening defeat at Illinois-Chicago.

In the Fastbreak Fest, junior guard Kelly Moylan continued her strong early-season showing.

Moylan had 15 points in a 75-52 loss to Purdue and 20 in an 85-69 defeat at the hands of Miami-Ohio. She has scored in double figures in four of the team's five games.



"Kelly has shot the ball well, and that has given the team a lot of confidence," Yow said of the Emmett native. "I've been real pleased with her movement without the basketball.

Suspect in killings gives up to police

Man hid at elderly woman's home before surrendering

By the Associated Press

CALIFORNIA, Mo. — The suspect in the slayings of three law officers and a sheriff's wife hid at an elderly woman's home for hours before surrendering without incident Tuesday night, authorities said.

James Johnson, 42, a Vietnam veteran and expert marksman, gave up about 6:30 p.m. after speaking by telephone with a negotiator from the Special Emergency Response team of the Missouri State Highway Patrol, said Sgt. Terry Moore, a patrol spokesman.

Johnson is believed to be responsible for a violent rampage that began Monday at his home in Jamesport.

The elderly woman told police she stepped onto her back porch Tuesday morning to find Johnson standing there, holding two long-barrel guns, Moore said at a brief news conference.

"He told her that basically that he wasn't going to hurt her, that he needed a place to stay," Moore said. "So they went inside, she even fixed him lunch today."

'Crooked U' may go soon

20-year-old logo for K-State Union confusing to some, not doing intended job

KRISTEEN YOUNG
Collegian Reporter

The "crooked U" logo seen on cups, sacks, ads and other things representing the K-State Union may be about to be changed.

The current logo has been used 20 years. Jack Sills, Union director, said most students associate the logo with the Union, but the current logo may not do what it was intended to do.

The creators of the "crooked U" wanted students to see a K, an S and a U in the purple box surrounding the large, white, crooked letter U.

Sills admits, however, to hearing the rumor of what the logo was supposed to be and admits he still can't envision a K, an S and a U.

"When I hear people that have been here five years say that they've finally figured it out, it may not be doing what it is supposed to," Sills said.

Sills said the intention of the logo is to represent the Union and have students associate things with the logo on it with the Union.

As the Union is student oriented, Sills and the board members of the Union promotions committee wanted the new logo to be initiated by students.

The board members relayed what they were looking for and the UPC programming committee began a contest to find a new logo. The winner will be given $100. More than 30 entries had been sent in to be judged.

"We were a little worried at first, because we didn't get very much response," said Sharon Willits, chairwoman for UPC promotions committee and senior in management.

"But then in the last week, we received the majority of the entries."

The UPC promotions committee narrowed the entries down to four and presented them to the board members.

The board members are currently reviewing the logos. They are discussing whether one of them will become the new logo.

"We'll take another look at the entries and perhaps extend the deadline for others," Sills said.

"We've received some nice entries, but I'm not sure if they fit on a letter head and as the way we envisioned."

Sills said a new logo won't be chosen simply for the sake of change.

"Maybe what we have now does the job better than anything we'll come up with," Sills said, "I think it is what it is now because of the long period of time it has been associated with the Union."

Willits said if the board chooses to change the logo, it will most likely choose one before Christmas vacation.

Organizations on campus plentiful

More than 375 exist now and more are on the way

KRISTEEN YOUNG
Collegian Reporter

More than 375 registered organizations exist at K-State, and still more are added each year.

Nearly everything anyone could ever want in a club should be able to be found, but students continue to find needs that aren't met by the existing clubs. Some of this year's newest clubs have organized to unite members who enjoy mountain bicycle riding, to bring together Asian-American students, to form a dance team or create an effort to reform marijuana laws.

Dan Ereth, president of Fat Tire Mountain Bike Club and 1991 K-State graduate in fisheries and wildlife biology, said the Triathlon Club was the only thing close to the organization he and other members wanted to form.

"There's just no club that is dedicated to mountain biking," Ereth said.

"Our biggest goal is to unite mountain bikers and show the city we are responsible by learning biking laws."

Jason Ly, president of Asian-American Students for Inter-cultural Awareness, formed the Asia organization with just two other friends.

Ly, freshman in mechanical engineering, said there is a group of Vietnamese students, but they are not a registered campus organization. Ly also wanted to form an organization that represents all Asian-American students.

Becoming a registered campus organization has its benefits. Both Ereth and Ly agree it isn't difficult to become registered.

There is a step by step process every new organization goes through. They first show interest to the University Activities Board, which will ultimately approve or turn away the request to become registered.

"The first thing to do would be to find out if there is such a group already on campus," said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and member of the UAB.

There are also requirements each organization must meet. There must be five members. They must present a constitution and statement of purposes for the club which includes why the club is being formed. They must have a full-time faculty advisor.

After meeting the requirements, admittance is relatively easy.

The UAB will then vote on the organization to be registered or not. Routson said this usually isn't difficult.

Getting organized

- The group must have five or more members.
- The group must have a constitution and a statement of purpose.
- The group must have a full-time faculty adviser.

"We're not going to vote against a group because we don't like them," she said.

"The only thing we might look into is a group that had negative things said about them by other universities or if we've had trouble with them in the past."

Trouble may come in the form of discrimination, which the UAB looks at closely in all organizations.

Once passed, an organization is classified into one of three categories. If it is comprised of at least 80 percent students, it is termed a student group. If less than 80 percent of the members are students, containing faculty, it is classified as a campus organization.

The third is a university community group for those organizations with anyone from the community.

This classification is primarily to recognize a student organization and allows them to benefit even more than the other two by paying less for using campus facilities.

"The (K-State) Union is a fee-funded building," Routson said, "so the Union's philosophy is that student groups can use it more cheaply."

Being registered as a campus or community club has plenty of its own benefits.

Registered organizations are allowed to use University facilities, including the Union for meetings. They are allowed to publicize on campus by posting flyers and chalk drawing on sidewalks.

They may use the campus mail service and participate in the activities carnival in the fall. One of the biggest advantages is the option to request Student Senate to allocate money to them from the student activities fee.

Wefald stresses sports, studies

Athletics window for the University, but balance needed with academics

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

One thing President Jon Wefald likes to stress about himself is his balance of support between athletics and academics.

Lee Borck, 1970 K-State graduate, said he thinks Wefald does an excellent job of balancing.

"I think it's very positive to have a president balance both. Athletics are the window of a university. It's how people view a university for the most part," he said.

And while Wefald said he doesn't necessarily think it's right to judge an institution by its athletic programs, he said it is the reality.

Wefald said after the K-State debate team won the 1990 national championship, he was quoted as saying the win was as important as going to the Final Four. He said a few people approached him after that and asked if he was only interested in academics.

"I'm very supportive of the debate team financially and every other way. I'm supportive of all constituent groups," Wefald said. "I also support the coaches. I always strive for balance."

Wefald said he wanted people to know that he does try to balance his time between the two aspects, so he sent out an informational packet to about 30 K-State alumni in October.

The packet contained an introductory letter stating how he is involved in the recruitment of the best and brightest students as well as excellent student athletes. The packet also included 15 letters to Wefald from various K-State athletic coaches thanking him for his support.

"I sent the letter to K-Staters in regional areas where such and such is a key booster and let them know, yes, I try to help coaches too," he said.

K-State Alumnus Carl Gerlach, however, said he was already aware of Wefald's support of athletics.

"Being an ex-athlete and on alumni board, I was very aware he was a big supporter," he said. "It is important for a school to communicate and keep high visibility in Kansas City. One thing Wefald has done is to continue to keep high visibility in Kansas City."

There was one letter included in the packet from Baseball Coach Mike Clark, who said Wefald helps his recruiting process.

"When we have our top recruits and his schedule matches up, he's able to sit down and talk to the recruit about the positive aspects of the University. It's unique to do that," he said. "It says this University is interested in you from the president on down."

Del Miller, assistant basketball coach, said he wasn't aware that Wefald copied one of his thank you letters for distribution, but he appreciates Wefald's support.

"I wasn't aware of it, but it certainly is fine. He does take an active interest in every aspect of the University," he said. "Some presidents won't do that with athletic programs for some reason or another."

There were four copied letters in the packet from Dana Altman, basketball coach, who also said he appreciates what Wefald does for his team.

"He's really concerned about communicating with everybody. This is part of his way with standing communication with alumni," he said.

One alumnus who received the communication packet contacted the Collegian and said that sending out expensive "voluminous packets of self-congratulatory letters" from his employees is going too far. But other alumni who were contacted did not agree.

Don Hoffman, former president of K-State's Alumni Association said he received the 15-letter packet and he really enjoyed it.

"Sometimes I like people to toot their own horns, if there is no one else around to do it," he said. "If you can back up what you are saying with good work, I see no problem with it."

Borck said he also likes to get any information that updates him about K-State activities.

"We're not local, so we don't get the Collegian for any detailed reports. We were glad to get the letter," he said.

Mark Calcara, a 1971 K-State graduate, said he receives a lot of correspondence from his alma mater including the packet.

"I put it in the perspective of all the other news reports I get. I took it as informative," he said.

Half Of This Year's Medical School Class Got There With Our Help.

To study alone for the MCAT is nearly impossible. To study without Stanley H. Kaplan is simply a bad career move.
Maybe it's our 50 years of experience. Our small classes and advanced teaching methods. Or a research department that reacts to test changes before most companies even know they exist.
Whatever it is, if medicine is in your future, Stanley H. Kaplan can help you start practicing right now.

Elmer Iseler Singers
Wednesday, December 11, 8 p.m.
Ring in the holidays with a festive concert by the distinguished Canadian chorus that has performed for Pope John Paul II, Queen Elizabeth II, and audiences around the world. Motet No. 6 by Bach, Regina coeli, Ave verum corpus, Sancta Maria by Mozart, and a Canadian Christmas medley highlight the program.
"When 20 voices blend as effortlessly and convincingly as the Elmer Iseler Singers did last evening at the Library of Congress, one could almost forget that any other musical instruments exist." (The Washington Post)

She urged Johnson to surrender and told him she had an afternoon party to attend and a man would be coming to pick her up.

"If she did not get picked up by this gentleman friend, then they would know that something is up," Moore said.

The woman's friend picked her up, and she had promised Johnson she would not tell police. But the couple drove straight to police headquarters and told police, who immediately surrounded the house and later began telephone negotiations with Johnson.

Moore refused to say where Johnson was being held for safety reasons.

The shootings began about 7:30 p.m. Monday following a domestic disturbance at Johnson's rural home near Jamestown.

Officials tried to figure out what pushed Johnson over the edge into violence. One of the victims, the wife of the Moniteau County sheriff, was a teacher whose students included Johnson's 17-year-old stepdaughter.

"He didn't like me from the word go," the stepdaughter, Dawn Becker, said Tuesday at the Sheriff's Office.

A neighbor, Lloyd Grotjan, said the girl came to his home Monday night asking to use the phone, saying, "We just had trouble at home."

Grotjan said the girl tried to make a long distance call but got no answer then called "a school teacher at Jamestown." Grotjan said he stepped away so the girl would have some privacy.

A few minutes later James Johnson opened the door and walked in, he said.

"The girl was where he could see her," Grotjan said. "He just got her by the arm. She never said a word."

The two then left, the neighbor said.

Grotjan said the girl's mother, Gerri, had been married to Johnson for less than a year. Jason Huntsperger, a classmate of Dawn Becker, said she told him Johnson often hit her.

"She always said her dad didn't want her living at home with him," Huntsperger said.

"He's not the type of person you'd expect to do this," said John Kay, the Moniteau County prosecuting attorney. "I always thought him to be a pretty quiet person."

An arrest warrant was issued Tuesday charging Johnson with first-degree murder in the death of Leslie Roark, 27, one of the slain deputies, Kay said.

Searchers used two helicopters and dogs during the manhunt, which closed businesses and schools as about 150 officers went door-to-door looking for Johnson. A flag flew at half-staff outside the red-brick courthouse in this county-seat community of about 3,300, surrounded by rolling hills. California is 110 miles east of Kansas City.

of the armed forces, and ongoing ethnic conflict will combine this winter to produce the most significant disorder in the former Soviet Union since the Bolsheviks consolidated power," Gates testified.

At the same time, discipline and cohesion in the formerly powerful Red Army are disintegrating, Gates said. Shortages of food, fuel and housing for troops are undermining morale and reliability of the forces is "dubious," he added.

Speaking to reporters in Chicago, President Bush said the United States is carefully following developments in the Soviet Union.

"There's a lot at stake for the American people to make sure problems that affect us and the rest of the world are properly handled," Bush said.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said Bush has not spoken by phone with Gorbachev.

Meanwhile, Bush signed legislation Tuesday normalizing trade relations with the Soviets. Congress approved the "most favored nation" trade status for the Soviets just before adjourning last month.

By dramatically reducing tariffs, the accord is expected to escalate trade between the two countries.

"We could not yet reach an agreement," the former health minister said. But he said another attempt would be made Wednesday and that he was optimistic.

The Bush administration registered its approval that the two sides had finally come together five weeks after an opening ceremony in Madrid, Spain. "The United States is delighted that the talks resumed today," Margaret Tutwiler, the department spokeswoman, said.

Israeli delegations met separately at the State Department with counterparts from Syria, Lebanon and a joint Jordan-Palestinian group. Delegates entered from separate entrances and did not shake hands. Journalists were barred from covering how the old enemies interacted.

Despite the apparent lack of progress, Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's chief spokesman, said: "It's been a good day. We finally made contact."

At the outset, Syria appeared to offer a concession. Chief negotiator Muwaffak Allaf said Israel could have peace if it relinquished the Golan Heights, a strategic outpost taken in the 1967 Six-Day War.

William Smith claims he was seduced by accuser

Said woman cried 'rape' after having sex twice in a half hour

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — A tense William Kennedy Smith took the stand Tuesday and painted his accuser as a sexually voracious woman who seduced him into sex twice in a half hour, then cried rape for reasons he can't explain.

The prosecutor asked Smith sarcastically: "What are you, some kind of sex machine here?" An objection blocked the answer.

"The issue here is I'm innocent!" Smith exclaimed as he fended off repeated suggestions by Assistant State Attorney Moira Lasch that his story was unbelievable.

Repeatedly she challenged his assertion that the woman was the sexual aggressor in an Easter weekend encounter that began at a nightclub.

"What are you saying, that she raped you, Mr. Smith?" the prosecutor snapped.

"Absolutely not!" Smith said.

The 31-year-old defendant was pale and nervous as he took the stand but gained confidence during questioning by his attorney, Roy Black.

In 4 1/2 hours on the stand, Smith gave a calm, step-by-step account that contradicted many points in the woman's testimony last week.

Smith said that after his sexual encounter with the woman, he told his cousin Patrick Kennedy: "This woman's a real nut."

Moments after he concluded his testimony, the defense rested its case. The prosecutor called six rebuttal witnesses, who briefly addressed technical points.

One witness was the accuser's mother, who said she purchased the bra and dress the woman wore and gave them to her a few days before she met Smith.

The judge told jurors the case would be placed in their hands Wednesday after final arguments and jury instructions.

The 30-year-old Florida woman testified tearfully for two days last week, portraying Smith as a cruel rapist who assaulted her without warning, without sexual foreplay or even suggestive language. She said he tackled her as she tried to leave the beach and raped her on the estate lawn.

He said the woman's bruises did not come from him.

Late in the day, Smith's attorney renewed a request to tell jurors that the woman had an abortion in the past. The judge refused.

Smith testified after the prosecutor and Circuit Court Judge Mary Lupo clashed over limitations placed on cross-examination. The judge ruled out any questions even hinting at three women's allegations that Smith had tried to sexually assault them in the 1980s.

The defense twice demanded a mistrial, arguing that Lasch's hostile questioning had moved outside legal limits. The judge scolded the prosecutor and told her if she asked another impermissible question, "You will not get away with it."

Smith is charged with sexual battery and battery. If convicted, he could be sentenced to 4 1/2 years in prison.

The fateful encounter began, he said, when his uncle, Sen. Edward Kennedy, roused him and Patrick from bed in the early morning hours of March 30 to go out for a beer. They went to Au Bar, a nightcub where he about his weight, but when the fans get on him like they did tonight, he just loves to push it up another notch," Mayberry said of Miller. "He's a big reason why we went 34-4 last season. Right now he's a little overweight, but by the end of the season, he'll be playing like he did last year."

In spite of being shackled by four personal fouls and 40 extra pounds, Miller rammed home a dunk on the baseline to foil the Cats' hopes of a comeback with 45 seconds left.

"That was about the biggest gorilla-looking dunk I've seen from the Big O in a long time," Richardson said. "As he keeps playing and getting in shape, we're going to see more and more of what 'O' can do."

Without Day's versatility and common 20-point outings, Miller and Mayberry knew it was up to them to lead the way. It was their failure to step forward that produced the upset loss to MU, they said. The same would not happen in Manhattan, they determined before the trip.

"They really expect a lot out of us, and it's up to us to really run this team," Mayberry said of the inexperienced members of the Razorbacks. "We looked at what we didn't do in the Missouri game, and we just knew there was no way we were going to come here and lose tonight."

Miller said, "We've just got to keep the guys heads up and try to get them in the right situations. I know we're missing Todd a lot right now, but we've got to just go out like Todd's gone to the NBA or something. We don't want to try to force anything, because it will start to come around."

49-33, scoring the first six points of the second half to all but put the game out of reach.

K-State slowly chipped away to cut the deficit to just six, 65-59, when Nickerson hit a 15-footer to the left of the lane with 1:17 left. But Arkansas ran off the game's final five points.

Miller led all scorers in the game with 18.

Despite the defeat, Altman and Co. believe some positives may have been attained.

"We'll definitely learn some patience from this game," Altman said. "We're going to see in the game film how fast we were going."

Nickerson also stressed the patience theme.

"We need to be really patient on the offensive end," he said. "In our set offense, that's the way things normally are. We set more picks, cut more."

said the woman "brushed against me."

"I said hi and she said hi," he said and recounted how a brief conversation led to dancing and kissing on the dance floor.

"I was feeling that I had gotten picked up," Smith said.

About 3 a.m., he said, the woman offered him a ride home and jumped at a chance to go swimming in the ocean off the Kennedy estate. The woman has said she doesn't know how to swim.

During cross-examination, Lasch asked sarcastically, "So she was just overcome with your animal magnetism and wanted to go home and have sex with you?"

"I have no idea what was going on in (her) mind," Smith said.

anyone."

Another potential problem Lange cited was how the senate would adjust to the new leadership next semester and how quickly the leaders would adjust to their new positions.

think his contract would be null and void if he's not president. I'm sure the university has had problems with contracts in the past. They should know more about the contract than someone who just signed it."

The ousting of Fulcher elevated Student Body Vice President Alan Lowden to the president's office, leaving the position of vice president open.

The new vice president will be a current senator who is elected by senate. Then, the senate vacancy will be advertised. People who apply will be interviewed by the senate's elections chairperson.

Lange said the senate managed to work well this semester under the circumstances, but next semester could be tough.

"I think Alan will be a more productive president than Darren was. Darren was so busy defending his job, he wasn't doing it," she said. "The new vice president will chair the meetings and will need time to bone up on their parliamentary procedure. We'll kind of have to get moving because there will only be seven or eight meetings for the new vice president."

Lange said one of the few positive aspects of the ordeal was that women's issues were addressed.

"It raised campus awareness," she said. "People used to say it was a personal thing, but just because you're in a relationship with someone doesn't make it right to hit them."

Another KU student senator, Nicola Heskett, said she was pleased with the ruling because it showed senate's decision was right.

"It shows senate has the authority to discipline its members. That's important," she said.

Heskett said the senate is creating specific guidelines for removal procedures for the future.

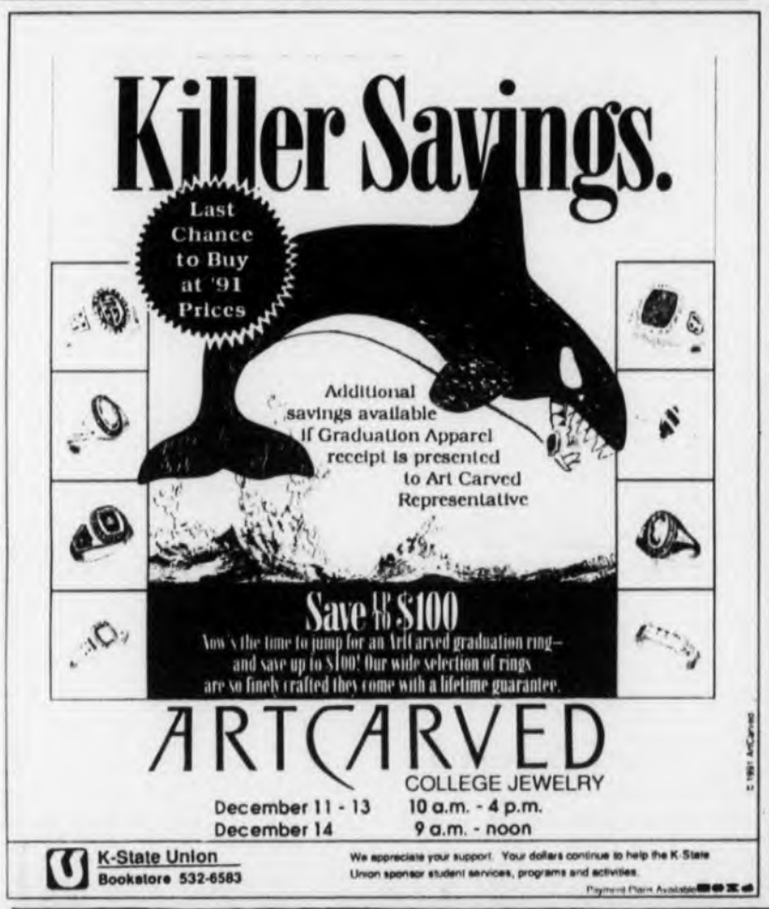
"So then we'll have them. Hopefully this will not happen again," she said. "The guidelines will be there so there will be no ambiguity as to what specific steps need to be taken."

Heskett said the senate was anxious to put the issue in the past, but there was still the possibility that Fulcher will appeal the board's decision.

"We have until January to appeal. I can't say at this time whether we will," LaSalle said.

Fulcher could not be reached for comment.

Lange said she did not think Fulcher would appeal the board's decision, but rather was going to file a civil suit against the university.



"Because he was an employee of the university and he signed an employment contract," she said. "I would

Smith acquitted of charges

Jury took 90 minutes to make the emotional ruling; accused grateful

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — William Kennedy Smith was acquitted Wednesday of sexual assault and battery in a case that focused national attention on date rape and put America's most famous family under a spotlight of scandal and scrutiny.

The jury took about 90 minutes to reject the allegations of a 30-year-old woman who said Smith chased her, tackled her on the lawn of the Kennedy's oceanfront estate and raped her under a full moon.

Smith wished a Merry Christmas to cheering supporters outside the courthouse.

"I want to thank the jurors," he said. "My life was in their hands and I'm so grateful."

He also thanked the judge and said, "I have an enormous debt to the system and to God, and I have a terrific faith in both of them."

Supporters of the woman condemned the cheering and the verdict.

Three members of the jury of four women and two men refused Wednesday night to talk publicly about the case.

"This has hurt all rape victims, and you're going to have a lot of victims that won't come forward because of what has been done to this woman," Robin Miller, who heads a group called Families Enraged Against Rape, said.

Shortly after the verdict was announced, the accuser's lawyer, David Roth, read a statement from his client saying she had no regrets.

"All that I have endured is worth it if I've made it easier for one woman to make what for me was the only choice I could so that I could look at myself in the mirror, and more importantly my daughter as she grows up," said the woman, who is unmarried and has a 2-year-old daughter.

She said she had been inundated with letters and calls from around the world, from countless women who have suffered the degradation of rape.

Roth said: "We accept the verdict. But not guilty does not equate to innocence."

Smith, 31, had taken the stand, adamantly denying the woman's charges. He painted her as a sexually aggressive woman who initiated sex after they met at a night club during Easter weekend.

Smith grinned as the verdict was read and embraced his lawyer, Roy Black. Across the courtroom in the jury box, foreman Thomas Stearns Jr., 62, began to weep. Another juror, Lea Haller, 37, had tears streaming down her face.

There was no other reaction; the judge had warned spectators they would face punishment.

Tough judge insisted on speedy trial, control

By the Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — The judge who presided at William Kennedy Smith's rape trial is a tough taskmaster. She evicted a journalist from court for smiling during graphic testimony.

Even Wednesday, when the jury returned with its verdict, Judge Mary Lupo delayed its announcement to order the people in the courtroom to refrain from any outbursts, and then reprimanded defense lawyer Roy Black for standing and hugging his client.

During pretrial proceedings, when delays piled up and lawyers wanted to wait a little longer, Lupo insisted on a start-up before Christmas. She set a deadline for the trial's end — something unheard of in other courts.

Hunger-aid groups struggle with each other

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Staff Writer

Tensions grow during the holidays when food and money are scarce, but for agencies with goals to help the needy, another kind of tension is well known.

As Manhattan's poor and hungry struggle for survival, local agencies struggle for power amongst themselves. In the midst of this struggle, the focus is not on the poor but on one another.

The fate of Manhattan's poor is often decided not only by the economy but by groups within the community who come to their assistance. These groups are the American Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the United Way, the Department of Social Rehabilitation Services, local church pantries and the Flinthills Breadbasket. They operate separately under different missions.

While the community believes these groups work together, unnamed sources have said lack of communication has caused problems.

Tensions may be due to funding problems or the focus of each group's mission.

The budgets of the American Red Cross and the Salvation Army come from fund raising, donations and the United Way. These agencies work together to provide emergency help and mandate a voucher system that allows the purchase of food, clothing, prescriptions, utilities and other necessities.

The Breadbasket and the local church pantries perform similar duties, but they focus on food, aiming to meet the needs of the hungry. These needs are met on a local level.

The Breadbasket, however, has sought federal funding. This causes confusion about whether it is a federally-funded organization or a local effort accepting donations for the less

Classes cut due to changes, lack of funding

Continuing Education drops Community Enrichment Program

JENNIFER RICHARDS
Collegian Reporter

Classes such as scuba diving and tae kwon do previously offered through the Community Enrichment Program may not be offered or will not be offered for academic credit in the future.

Jeff Wilson, Scuba diving instructor for six years, said he is disappointed about the failure of the Community Enrichment Program.

"The physical education department and others show no interest in the program," Wilson said.

Wilson said he will be losing 75 percent of his students as a result and has not been told why.

Lack of funding and the change of the Department of Physical Education from the College of Arts and Sciences to the Department of Kinesiology were two things that contributed to the program's end, Wilson said.

"I have never heard of a school with no physical education department," he said.

"Due to the financial cuts the University is facing, 20-40 of the Community Enrichment activities have had to be cut from either no funding or lack of instructor expertise," said Larry Noble, head of the kinesiology department. "Continuing Education pulled out, and so did we."

Funding for the Community Enrichment Program was primarily state money for Continuing Education.

Offering the classes minus academic credit may be part of the solution.

"It is painful to drop things, but it is not because they are weak. Times are tough," said Noble, who was at one time coordinator of the Community Enrichment Program.

Vice Provost, Bob Kruh said, "We're trying to sort out our priorities. The financial plight affects us in many ways."

Priority is being set on water safety instruction and teacher certification, Kruh said.

"Even though we're eliminating credit for these classes, we're trying to offer the classes through UFM," Kruh said.

Union loses more republics

Gorbachev, Yeltsin battle for control; new commonwealth gaining support

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin said Wednesday two more republics will join the commonwealth forged by the three Slavic republics, adding momentum to efforts to replace the dissolving Soviet Union with a new political arrangement.

Four other republics called a meeting to decide their stand on the commonwealth, founded over the weekend by Russia, Ukraine and Byelorussia.

Yeltsin met with senior Soviet Defense Ministry officials and army commanders to win support for the commonwealth, one day after Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev hosted talks with the same military leaders.

Gorbachev and Yeltsin are battling over who will decide the fate of the former Soviet Union, and both the Russian and the Soviet legislatures convene Thursday for crucial sessions on the new commonwealth. Ukraine and Byelorussia have already ratified it.

Yeltsin and Gorbachev met Wednesday for the second straight day. They refused to speak with reporters, but Yeltsin said later that Gorbachev had ruled out the use of force in their political confrontation, the Russian Information Agency reported.

Yeltsin told a separate meeting of Russian lawmakers that Gorbachev would remain commander-in-chief of the military for the present.

Russian news

- While Boris Yeltsin and Mikhail Gorbachev are deciding the future of the new commonwealth, the first non-Slavic republics, Armenia and Kirgizia, have decided to join the union.
- Currently, the United States seems to be recognizing Yeltsin as the major power in the nation.
- Yeltsin's proposal of the commonwealth would eliminate all central structures except command of the armed forces, while Gorbachev's plan preserves his presidency, and a coordinating role in economic policy, nuclear energy, transportation, and military control.

Although Gorbachev has struggled to keep the union intact, an aide acknowledged that it was a lost cause.

Igor Malashenko said on national television that the Soviet leader must retain that power and the right to represent the republics in foreign relations — even if he were to resign.

"I think that Mikhail Gorbachev is ready to resign, probably he will do that, but I don't think his potential is exhausted," said Malashenko.

"The U.S.S.R., though no longer existing, remains a nuclear superpower, and for an interim period Russia, Byelorussia, Ukraine and

Parking Services moving to Burt

MELANIE HUNDLEY
Collegian Reporter

Students paying parking tickets or wishing to have any questions or concerns answered about parking will soon have to go to a different location.

University Parking Services will move from its current location in East Stadium, which is shared with the K-State Police Department, to Burt Hall.

Dwain Archer, assistant manager of parking services, said the move won't occur until next semester.

"We're waiting for the remodeling of the space in Burt Hall to be completed," Archer said. "We're hoping to be moved in by February or March 1992."

Parking services' new office is in the northwest corner of the first floor. Archer said the office will also be accessible to the handicapped.

Archer said the relocation is part of the separation of the parking permit office and the K-State Police Department. The two entities under the Department of Public Safety were officially split into two parts as of July 1, primarily because of lack of space.

Separate parking and police departments is not a completely un-

Omaha bans police chases

OMAHA, Neb. (AP) — Police car chases have been banned in Omaha because the city faces more than $10 million in lawsuits filed by people who claim they were injured during pursuits, the police chief said.

A 10-year-old law makes local governments liable for injuries and deaths connected with pursuits, even if officers were not negligent.

"There will be no police pursuits in the city of Omaha for any reason. Period," Skinner said Tuesday.

Five of the lawsuits that prompted Tuesday's ban were filed from October 1986 to October 1990. Five more — seeking a total of $7 million — were filed last month all in connection with the same accident.

State Sen. Ernie Chambers sponsored the amendment that changed the law in 1981.

Another legislator said he felt Skinner's ban was an attempt to pressure the legislature to change the law, but Skinner said he acted because he only recently learned of several of the lawsuits.

Credit card companies have targeted students

Professor says it's a financial scam, interest rates 3 times higher than many banks

HEATHER SMITH
Collegian Reporter

They're all over campus, offering a free six-pack of cola if a student will only apply for a new credit card. It seems to be in the student's benefit. Besides, everyone says the easiest time to get a credit card is while you're still in college.

What many people are not aware of is that the interest rates on these cards are often more than three times the prime rate of most banks, and these lenders are targeting college students to get them hooked on easy credit.

Allen Cogley, professor of mechanical engineering, is trying to do something about this by writing letters to the K-State administration and the United States Legislature.

"It's a financial scam," Cogley said.

Cogley said he was upset that credit card companies were issuing credit cards without having a job requirement. Most likely these students will have no way to pay their bills, he said, and the parents will end up having to bail the student out.

Jack Sills, director of the K-State Union, said that if the student is older than 21 years of age, the credit card will only affect the student's parents as much as the parents let it.

Sills said he thought there were times when it was beneficial for students to have a credit card. Two examples he gave were times when a student needs to reserve a hotel room or has an emergency, such as car trouble or an accident.

Cogley said he has asked the K-State Union to stop putting applications for credit cards in books and bags from the Union Bookstore because he said he thought it was inappropriate.

Sills said the Union does not get any money for putting the credit card applications in shopping bags, but they do get the bags at a reduced cost.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said he had contacted the Consumer Relations Board to ask them to review the Union's practice of handing out the credit card applications.

STUDENT CREDIT CARDS

- Many students have credit cards with interest rates three times the prime interest rates.
- Many times, students' parents pay the price of students charging more than they can pay for.

Bosco said he had also talked to the the Union Activities Board about the credit cards. Bosco said the UAB is currently reviewing the campus solicitation policies.

Currently, a campus organization or a department has to sponsor the credit card companies before they can come on campus, he said.

Cogley has asked the leaders on campus to say they believe it is inappropriate to allow the companies on campus.

Students who want cards should ask their parents for them because they usually end up paying for them anyway, Cogley said.

Students upset by amount of fees for intersession

$37.50 charged for all classes including Continuing Education

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

Students taking intersession classes have voiced concern about the $3.75 they are required to pay per day of class for student and health fees.

The fees are similar to fees during the regular semester and are in addition to tuition costs.

Garrett Rundell, senior in business administration, is taking an intersession course in January. He will be paying $162 in tuition and $37.50 in student and health fees.

"It really irks me," he said. "We're being excessively charged."

Rundell said he has already been charged for these services during the fall and spring semesters and won't use them during intersession anyway.

The Division of Continuing Education has been assessing the $3.75 fee for the last five years.

Previously, students participating in any Continuing Education classes on campus, including the intersessions, were only charged the flat tuition rate, which is currently $54 per undergraduate credit hour and $66 per graduate credit hour for residents.

The non-resident fees are $177 per undergraduate credit hour and $189 per graduate credit hour.

The student and health fees were added to comply with the Kansas Board of Regents request that Con-

Kansas companies recycle goods

TAMKO, Central Fiber Corp. sell recycled products; costs limit others from recycling

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

Although a car battery may not be the thing you want on the end of your fishing line, some fishing lures are made of lead extracted from car batteries that have been recycled in Kansas.

ENVIRONMENT

Less than five businesses in the state actually process recycled waste into useful materials or final products. There are a number of reasons why Kansas has so few of these processing plants.

Despite all the factors, some businesses in Kansas are helping prevent waste from reaching the landfills. Two companies, TAMKO Asphalt Products Inc. and Central Fiber Corporation, successfully process newsprint and cardboard into useful products sold for a profit.

"Because of the push, recycling has created a glut in the paper markets," said Dennis Kichler, recycling manager of Central Fiber Corporation.

He said they can make a profit because they get their paper at practically no cost due to the abundant supply. By mixing newsprint and cardboard fibers, Kichler's company creates home insulation.

He said his product is very competitive compared with the alternative insulation made of fiber glass but could be more competitive if people were better educated.

"There's still a lot of scenarios that, if it's recycled, it's not as good," Kichler said. "People aren't educated enough."

The belief that recycled products are inferior to products produced from original materials is not true, Kichler said.

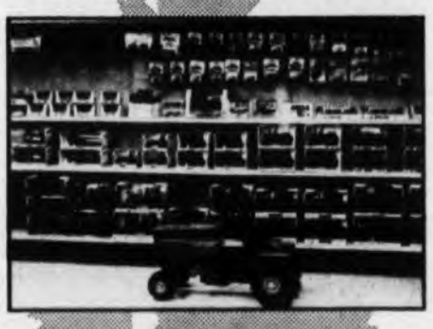
"But recycled products are often equal if not better than the original product."

Recycling business

- Although the manufacture of items made of recycled materials is friendly to the environment, it is very costly in research and equipment.
- Some business owners blame the government for not financially supporting the research and development of high-tech equipment necessary to produce quality products.
- The business of producing recycled product is also not profitable because of consumers' lack of education and outdated beliefs that recycled products are inferior.

Some recycled products are not only better but offer safety advantages over their counterparts. For example insulation made with paper fibers is healthier for those installing it than fiberglass insulation, Kichler said.

TAMKO Asphalt Products Inc., another Kansas company, produces felt roofing paper, said Jerry Meyer, general manager of the company. He said although there's not a big demand for felt roofing paper made from paper, they have a profitable business.



TAMKO's competition is with felt roofing paper created out of fiberglass. Meyer's said the reason there are so few processing plants in Kansas is due to the extreme cost of building and purchasing expensive equipment.

Glenn Rappard, vice president of operations for Metal Control of Kansas Inc., said, "If you're going to develop a new high tech process to create a new clean environmental product after 50 years of neglect, it takes much research, and research is expensive."

Smith

Trial educational for those involved, public

Americans tuned in to the William Kennedy Smith trial, and then some tuned right back out. Regardless, many learned more about the U.S. court system during the last 10 days than during 10 years of school.

The public learned that all courtrooms are not historical monuments filled with huge oak desks and ornate benches. And no matter what you might see on "L.A. Law," lawyers aren't allowed to badger witnesses, twisting what they say. We learned that even if a case is about a subject as controversial and intimate as date rape, emotions are prohibited — from everyone involved.

And without a doubt, we learned that a trial is a long, monotonous, tedious process, but the U.S. justice system still prevails, because regardless of whether the not-guilty verdict is agreed upon by everyone, few argue that the jury was anything but honest and hard working.

It was inevitable that the trial be extensively covered by television, radio and newspapers — particularly tabloids who found the date rape trial to be a sizzling, sex-filled story.

Watching the case unfold in the courtroom allowed the public to draw its own unbiased conclusions.

Even Judge Mary Lupo, after the jury acquitted Smith, commended the media for abiding by the laws of the State of Florida and the rules of the Palm Springs courtroom. She paid the media more compliments in the 15 minutes of her post-trial remarks than all the attorneys analyzing the trial have paid prosecuting attorney Moira Lasch in the last 10 days.

And although Lasch was unsuccessful, to say the least, in a statement released after the trial, the alleged victim said she in no way regretted her decision to file charges against Smith.

She said if she helped even one rape victim by telling of her own trauma, it was worth it. She may not have won the case, but she had the courage to tell her side of the story. She proved that just reporting a rape is important in and of itself.

That, perhaps, is the most valuable lesson of all.

Kansas

Security should be in work, not offices

If you can't keep the people happy, you'd better watch your butt.

That is the theme in the Kansas capital. With disgruntled masses breathing down their necks, our legislators have decided that the time has come to beef up security in their workplace.

Rather than boosting protection and alienating the constituents more, lawmakers must solve the problem.

It doesn't take much to figure out why people are mad. Funding for public schools is down, money for the MOE is down. But ironically enough, taxes are up.

And making statements like that of House Minority Leader, Robert Miller, who said "If some nut knew how lax security is around here, we could all have a serious problem," at the same time that a decision whether to close down one of the state's five mental hospitals was being discussed is not the most brilliant thing to do.

Rather than taking a reactionary step that will waste more money (money that has to come from somewhere) the politicians must do their jobs. Necessity demands that they be accountable to the people.

After all, the legislators are not the government, the people are.

SHAWN BRUCE

Columnist enjoys hearing comments, good and bad

There's one question I get asked more than any other. People come to me and say, "Mr. Bruce, are you going to pay this bill? The phone company is not an organization to be trifled with, mister."

But, phone cops excepted, the second most asked question I hear is, "Shawn, what's it like to be a Collegian columnist?"

Well, that's a question that deserves a long, thoughtful answer. Unfortunately, I'm so busy trying to sell enough plasma to pay off the phone company and keep my butt out of jail that I don't have the time. Nonetheless, I'll give you a brief synopsis of what this past year has been like.

Maybe the most important thing to know is that, no matter what you write, someone's going to be offended. And they'll let you know about it.

The first column I ever wrote was about telephone sex. I knew it was a risky topic, but, damn it, sometimes you just have to take that chance.

I was prepared for a backlash, but one graduate teaching assistant in the English department went to an extreme. She cut out my column picture, pasted it on her office wall and put words to the effect underneath that said I was worried about the length of my penis.

I didn't know quite how to respond to that. If you say you're not worried about that, you come off looking like a sexist pig. If you say you are worried about it, you'll never be able to watch Monday Night Football with the guys again without hearing jokes at your expense.

Also, it's important to remember that as a columnist, you're one of the most visible members of the Collegian staff. Therefore, you had better be prepared to defend anything the paper does.

I remember when the Collegian ran a nude photo of the local band and pin-up poster stars, Roach Factory. A friend asked where the hell the Collegian got off running offensive photos.

I came up with a great response about how the First Amendment gives us the right to do things such as run nude photos and how photos like that facilitate discussions and arguments.

Unfortunately, I didn't come up with this argument until about three hours after my friend had left. The only sounds coming from me while he was questioning me were, "Well, uh, uh ... ." I came off looking like a Wal-Mart janitor (minus the drool and name tag).

Still, every week, my picture and thoughts were in the paper, and I must admit I enjoyed the publicity. It's nice to have people come up to you and say they like your work. But the bottom line is, don't take yourself too seriously.

I was sitting in a bar one night when the bartender came over and said, "Hey, you write for the Collegian, don't you?"

I admitted to this, and she said, "I really like your stuff." I thanked her.

She then said, "Ed Skoog, you're all right."

It's been fun, people. In the immortal words of David Letterman: Thank you, good night, drive safely.

Your friend, Shawn E. Bruce.

Learning about learning

Encounter, friend remind student of different ways to learn

NOBANA NAKAJIMA GUEST

Nobana Nakajima is a graduate student in education.

About sunset last Sunday, I was studying for my final at the coffee shop in Aggieville which seemed to me the most liberal place in this town, when a young man came in and sat down with a newspaper. Then, facing in my direction, he held up the paper in both hands. Although there was a distance between him and me, he seemed to want to attract my attention.

I could not see what the articles were, but as soon as I recognized that one of them was the first page of the newspaper, I pretended not to notice him. I was afraid of the way he was acting. I do not know whether anyone else noticed what he was doing. I felt isolated. There were many people there, but they enjoyed talking with their friends above the soft music.

After the young man left, I got a closer look at the newspaper. There was a big article about Pearl Harbor on the first page.

I am Japanese. I am not sure if he could recognize that or what he wanted to say to me. His demonstration took less than one minute, but because of it, I actually felt pain rather than discomfort. I was not brave enough to talk with him so that we could try to understand each other, but I did try to avoid making trouble. I can ignore and forget such a thing — it is probably not a big matter in my campus life.

He seemed not to be kidding. He was probably a very serious person who had loyalty for his country. I know that in 1941, there were many people just like him in Japan. His act made me realize that the war happened not because of people's malice, but because of their good will and loyalty to their countries. And I want to know what we should learn for the future from the Pearl Harbor anniversary.

As you know, there are many international students at K-State. But I am not sure there is a good atmosphere to encourage international understanding. Actually, it is still difficult to discuss such political issues frankly.

One day, my Chinese friend asked me with hesitation, even though we had known each other about a year, "What do you think about what Japan did to China?" (Sometimes the more we become friends, the more difficult it becomes to ask such a question.)

As I wondered how to answer it, she said to me, "We do not hate Japanese people." When Japan invaded China, the Japanese people could do nothing except show loyalty to the emperor.

Once, an old Japanese woman said she regretted she had not been able to acquire higher education. She believed she would have realized the war was wrong, even though it happened in the name of justice if she had taken higher education. Ironically, the war was started by the decision of some elite people who were the most highly educated in the nation.

I always ask what I can learn on this campus. It is more important for me to have a friend like my Chinese friend than to read books in a library. She made me realize my future responsibility as a citizen of a democratic country.

People often ask me why I chose K-State. The answer is that one of the people I most revere, Hachiro Yuasa, a great educator in Japan, was an alumni of K-State.

During World War II, he espoused non-involvement and protected academic freedom of the University as the chancellor, even though the University became a target of fierce attacks of nationalists and militarists. He said his experiences with people at K-State confirmed his beliefs about academic freedom. I believe all the things he did as an educator were right.

I do not know whether what I learn from people in my K-State days will change me as much as what Yuasa learned in his K-State days. But I gradually appreciate that man in the coffee shop. If he had not made this small demonstration, the 50th Pearl Harbor anniversary would have had no meaning for me.

I hope what he did was not out of a feeling of resentment about the past but out of hope for peace in the future with a global view.

His short hair cut remains in my mind even now.

The following letters are a sample of about 50 letters dealing with the English GTAs' situation submitted to the Collegian.

GTAs' education also important

Editor,
I am writing to express my concern about the unfair treatment of the GTAs in the English department. During the past several semesters, the administration has consistently raised the cap on students in each class, creating more and more work for the GTAs. This has been done without a corresponding increase in their salaries, and it should be noted that GTAs in other departments are making about $300 more per month than those in English. The administration needs to realize that GTAs are students as well as teachers, and raising their work load could detract from their education.

It is not surprising that these students are planning a strike. We, as a student body, should support their cause and push the administration to compensate them properly. This movement will be of no consequence to us as students. We will still receive our grades. The English GTAs need our support and the quality of education we receive at K-State is largely up to us.

Crash course reveals GTAs' problems

Editor,
Many of the freshmen at K-State have received a crash course over the organization Student Association for Graduates in English. The organization has been pushing for information over the pay and requirements of all GTAs. The administration has sidestepped and snowballed this effort. For two weeks, SAGE has been pointed to almost every office in Anderson Hall for the information, and each time one office has pointed them to another. Once members reached the correct office, that office lied to SAGE by saying it did not have the information.

As a result of all the snowballing, SAGE agreed to hold grades back for two weeks after they are due, Dec. 23. I fully support the efforts of SAGE, and I hope SAGE gets its information.

David Lenhert
Freshman in arts and sciences

Information should not be withheld

Editor,
The recent conflict between GTAs and the administration is a little immature. The administration is withholding information that should be accessible to anyone who wants it. The goal of SAGE is to receive equal pay for equal work. This is a reasonable request, which is not only fair for the GTAs, but will increase the quality of education at K-State. The administration should be willing to work to improve the quality of education. After all, they work for the students.

fortunate in the community. Many have scrutinized the Breadbasket and its cause.

The Breadbasket accepts both food and monetary donations.

"When donating (money) to the Breadbasket, I wonder what percent of the donations goes to food for the hungry," said Sharon Iondola, director of the Salvation Army. "When you donate to the food pantries, 100 percent of it goes to food for the pantries."

Out of a working budget of $53,646.33 in 1990, $32,897 was in private contributions. Only $12,337.08 was spent on food. The rest was used for operational expenses. Operational expenses include staff salaries, maintenance, utilities, supplies, vehicle operation and other miscellaneous expenses.

"The Breadbasket is a great clearing house when the food gets to the poor, but money donated could be another question," said the Rev. Jerome Morgan of Seven Dolors Church.

Only a portion of the Breadbasket's checking account is available due to a separate building fund. The building fund, set up from what the Breadbasket says is a surplus left over from the donation for the current building is in an account with a separate $20,000 donation for that purpose. Hanna said more space for the Breadbasket is needed.

The food purchased once a year and used for the holiday baskets is given out during Thanksgiving and Christmas. About 5 percent of the people who receive the baskets are classified as critically hungry.

While it is difficult to estimate the number of critically hungry in Manhattan, those familiar with the problem believe 5 percent is a low percentage of the total need.

The Breadbasket's 1990 mission statement says it is to minimize hunger and poverty at a local level through the distribution of available food and to nurture projects that will help alleviate hunger and poverty. The mission statement has been altered since the Breadbasket filed its articles of incorporation at the Secretary of State's office in Topeka, but Attina Hanna, executive director of the Breadbasket, said the mission has changed, because the Breadbasket is flexible and alert to the community needs. Hanna said the nurturing of projects was an important addition to the mission of the Breadbasket, because only with education can the cycle of hunger and poverty be stopped.

"The goal of the food bank is to listen to the community's needs and to create projects and resources beneficial to the families in need," Hanna said.

The Breadbasket claims to serve as a food bank, filtering food through the community from the hands of the donors to the church pantries. It is used to supply the local church pantries with the items they need to feed the hungry.

Other than during the holidays, the Breadbasket does not directly feed the hungry. It does, however, supply a distribution center for SRS commodities and is paid a handling fee to do so. Some pantry members said, although the Breadbasket serves a purpose in the community, food is somewhat sparse during the summer and early fall months which causes problems. When efforts for food drives fail or don't bring in enough food, those who suffer are the pantries, because they foot the bill for the missing food.

"Last year the Kaw Valley Food Drive didn't bring in very much, and we couldn't compromise it all, so hopefully some of the pantry recipients received baskets this year," McKee said.

Local pantries have had to compensate for what the Breadbasket, as a food bank, has been unable to supply.

"We have overspent our budget many times in the past, but the Breadbasket does try to help us when they can," McKee said.

Advertising and publicity may be part of the cause of confusion. Also contributing to confusion is lack of communication and misunderstanding among those who work to feed the hungry.

"I think there is a misinterpretation. With a lot of publicity, people think the Breadbasket is where people can go and get food when they need it, but the pantries supply those needs," said Dan Beatty, treasurer of the Breadbasket. "It takes a certain amount of money to keep our doors open, but we are not in the food business — we are a food distribution service."

An unnamed source said the goals of the Breadbasket are confusing and cited the Mayor's Holiday Tree as an example. The source said that members of this committee are prominent community figures whose prominence intimidates those who might point out problems with the efforts to aid the hungry.

Frustrations were shared by another source requesting anonymity about the Breadbasket helping share the costs of utility assistance in the past, as the sign in front of the Mayor's Holiday tree states it does, but this year utility assistance will not be given. The source said when the Breadbasket was asked questions concerning the issue, the questions went unanswered.

Yvonne Lacy, director of the federally-funded headstart program and Breadbasket board member said, "How you feed the poor and the attitude you have toward the poor is important — are we doing it the right way? I'm not sure, but we are passing out the food."

"I too have heard the concerns and sensed negativism in the community," Pastor Keith Wiens of First Lutheran Church said. "I hope people aren't getting the impression that the Breadbasket is giving the impression it is doing everything. The goal many of us are going for is to alleviate hunger, but I don't think any of us feel we have come close to our goal, because there are plenty of people left hungry to prove that we haven't."

Kazakhstan can form a military strategic union and entrust Mikhail Gorbachev with the authority to be at its head," he said.

Those four republics hold the Soviet Union's 27,000 nuclear warheads.

The United States signalled it was focusing more on Yeltsin as the country's power broker.

U.S. Ambassador Robert Strauss told the House Armed Services Committee in Washington he believed Yeltsin would succeed in winning ratification of the commonwealth agreement.

"That puts President Yeltsin in a very strong position vis-a-vis President Gorbachev," Strauss said. "Unquestionably, President Yeltsin and his various ministers are the people with whom we will deal."

He added that the Soviet military, which had been seen as remaining primarily loyal to the dwindling central government, will then be under the strong influence of President Yeltsin also.

Yeltsin told reporters that Armenia and Kirgizia would be the first non-Slavic republics to join the commonwealth.

Armenia's decision was no surprise. Surrounded by hostile neighbors, Armenia has sought recently to improve relations with Russia.

Despite Yeltsin's announcement, Kirgizia President Askar Akayev told his republic's lawmakers it was up to them to decide to decide the issue of membership in the commonwealth, Tass reported.

Kirgizia will join the other Central Asian republics of Tadzhikistan, Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan at a meeting Thursday to decide on joining the commonwealth. Kazakhstan also will attend.

Malashenko said Gorbachev could help serve as a bridge between the three Slavic republics and the Muslim republics were he given a role in forming the commonwealth.

Gorbachev's aides have been working hard to persuade the nation that he must stay in power and that the commonwealth is just a variation of his Union Treaty to hold the country together.

The commonwealth would eliminate all central structures except command over the armed forces. Gorbachev's proposal would preserve his presidency, and a coordinating role in economic policy, nuclear energy, transportation and military control.

The military will play a key role in determining who will win. The refusal of senior officers to obey orders of the August coup plotters played a crucial part in the collapse of the putsch.

A Soviet Defense Ministry spokesman was quoted as telling Tass that Yeltsin favors unified control over the superpower's estimated 3.7 million soldiers and nuclear arsenal.

"There can be no question about any division of the armed forces. The world public need have no worry about it," Lt. Gen. Valery Manilov quoted Yeltsin as saying, according to the Tass report.

Yeltsin later said his meeting with military leaders addressed how to make the life of servicemen better, how to protect them, and how in this very difficult period to create a stable situation in the army.

Royals trade Saberhagen

KC gets McReynolds, Jeffries, Miller for pitching ace, Pecota

By the Associated Press

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. — Two-time Cy Young Award winner Bret Saberhagen was traded to the New York Mets by the Kansas City Royals for Kevin McReynolds and Gregg Jefferies in a five-player deal Wednesday night.

The biggest trade of the winter meetings also sent infielder Keith Miller to Kansas City and second baseman Bill Pecota to the Mets.

The Mets came to the meetings looking for a pitcher and they got one of the best in baseball. Saberhagen, 13-8 last season, won the American League Cy Young Award in 1989 when he was 23-6 and in 1985 with a 20-6 mark.

"I know the New York Mets have made some big deals in their history but none involving so many quality players," Mets general manager Al Harazin said. "Saberhagen is one of the three or four best pitchers in baseball."

"What we did was a difficult thing," Royals GM Herk Robinson said. "We have finished sixth the last two seasons, so if Bret Saberhagen won four more Cy Young Awards and we didn't win it doesn't mean a thing."

He joins a starting rotation which includes Dwight Gooden, David Cone and Sid Fernandez.

The Mets had extra players to trade after signing free agent first baseman Eddie Murray and outfielder Bobby Bonilla. New York and Kansas City had been discussing Royals pitchers Kevin Appier and Tom Gordon, but the Royals liked their future.

McReynolds is coming off a disappointing season when he hit .259 with 16 homers and 74 RBIs.

The Mets had high hopes for Jefferies when he joined the club in 1988, projecting him as a .300 hitter.

But he had trouble adjusting to the pressures of New York and did not fit in with his teammates. Jefferies hit .272 last season with nine homers and 62 RBIs.

At one point, he even sent an open letter to the fans of New York explaining how he was mistreated by his teammates.

The Mets always had trouble finding a place to play him. He came up as a third baseman and was later moved to second base. But he had trouble handling either position.

New York, considered a pennant contender, had a miserable year in 1991 and finished fifth in the NL East.

Just before the end of the season, Frank Cashen stepped down as general manager and Harazin moved in.

Harazin moved fast to keep the Mets from sinking by hiring Jeff Torborg to manage and signing Murray for $7.5 million over two years and Bonilla for a record $29 million over five years.

Saberhagen made $2.95 million last season and was inconsistent. But the Mets felt they needed a solid starter because Frank Viola is leaving as a free agent.

The Royals have also made a major push for first in the AL West by signing free agent Wally Joyner.

WINTER TRADES

Here are Kansas City's transactions from the baseball winter meetings this week.

- Acquired California free-agent Wally Joyner.
- Traded first baseman Todd Benzinger to Los Angeles for outfielder Chris Gwynn and minor-league second baseman Domingo Mota.
- Traded pitcher Bret Saberhagen and infielder Bill Pecota to the New York Mets for outfielders Kevin McReynolds and Keith Miller and infielder Gregg Jeffries.
- Traded pitcher Storm Davis to Baltimore for catcher Bob Melvin.

Turnovers hurt Lady Cats in loss

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

If Lady Cats coach Susan Yow knew her team would miss only 19 shots against Southwest Missouri State on Wednesday, she would have liked her chances against the Bears.

However, thanks to 31 turnovers, K-State made only 16 field goals, one less than the Bears first-half total. As a result, Southwest Missouri State cruised to a 66-49 win at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Lady Cats, who were without senior guard Mary Jo Miller, turned the ball over on 40 percent of their first half possessions as they took a 36-23 deficit into the locker room. The Bears went on a 17-7 run to close out the half.

Miller suffered an ankle injury in Saturday's loss to Miami (Ohio).

"I really have a lot of mixed emotions about this game for our players," Yow said. "I thought Gretchen (Bertrand) played with a lot of courage. She played really well, Kelly Moylan played well, and Leah and Jen. I took them out midway through the second half because they were playing hard and it just wasn't working."

Bertrand led the Lady Cats with 17 points, 13 of which came in the second half when she accounted for half the team's points.

"Gretchen did a great job," Yow said. "she played well out of both the one and two spots."

"I'm really comfortable now," Bertrand said. "Last year, I played like a freshman. We needed someone to step up tonight and I didn't want to see us lose by 35."

"I think we really missed MJ (Miller) out there for her mental outlook," Yow said. "I think it would have changed the whole game to have had her in there. Right now, we just can't play without her. She's like our Steve Henson and without her, we're a team without a leader.

Fan support needs to stay

ERIC BROWN

Now that the dangerous shark is gone and the water appears to be safe again, please don't jump back off.

Your rowing ability is needed now more than ever.

With the Arkansas game now a memory, it is vital to program that the attendance figures continue to rise rather than return to that of the season's first three games.

The paid attendance Tuesday — 9,399 — was a better showing than the embarrassing turnouts at the first few games. However, a game against an opponent like Arkansas shouldn't have any empty seats.

That's a big downer at a school that was once known as one of the toughest universities to steal a win. Even sadder is the fact that the student body here is still capable of playing such a role.

The student section was full for the Razorbacks, and more importantly, the fans were charged up. This is a good step. The next one is to participate in the game in a way that demonstrates a strong knowledge of the game.

K-Staters have that knowledge, yet throwing things on the court during the game shows absolutely no knowledge. It's a shame that a few people can make a group look bad, but that's the case when those few cannot be controlled. How impressive that must look on television (and to recruits). Being knowledgeable and acting that way are two very different things.

I'm sure that many people feel like Bramlage Coliseum is the reason why the crowd isn't as big a part of Wildcat basketball as in past years. The theory that the sound may not carry as well as in Ahearn Field House because of the spacious setting is probably a legitimate point. However, the move from Nichols Gymnasium to Ahearn involved a reduction in sound, but that didn't stop the crowd from becoming what Indiana coach Bobby Knight called the toughest arena to play in in the nation. It was the crowds, year in and year out, that made Ahearn the raucous place that we all remember it to be.

Bramlage can step into that category, but it seems that instead, the atmosphere is moving toward the opposite end of the spectrum.

It is a strange occurrence that K-State basketball has changed its image to one that is more exciting to watch, yet the crowd size has diminished at the same time. This year's team is a squad that should be a lock to create the kind of excitement known to these parts in basketball season.

Tuesday's game did nothing to alter that. It was a very disappointing loss, but one in which the young Cats will use as a tool in later contests.

Keep in mind that it was the first big-time game for Gaylon Nickerson, Vincent Jackson, Trasel Rone, Deryl Cunningham and Brian Henson. None of them had played in such a game, much less against the tenacious defense of the Razorbacks.

It was a tribute for them to play Arkansas, perhaps the toughest team on the schedule, the way they did and it shows how tough K-State really will be when the Big Eight season gets underway.

"This is the first time in many years of coaching that I've walked on the floor and was afraid of being blown out," Nolan Richardson said about the contest.

Considering the schedule that the Hogs played last year, that puts K-State above an elite group, including one of the greatest teams of all time, the 1990 UNLV powerhouse.

ICE MEN

Well-traveled squad ready to join hockey division

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

One thing is for sure — these guys love their sport.

When a team travels 120 miles to play its home games and practice, the point is difficult to argue.

The K-State team that faces that situation is the hockey club, which plays its home games in the George Bode Jr. Ice Arena in St. Joseph, Mo.

"As a full-time student and part-time worker you have to have a strong commitment to hockey if you play at K-State," said Tony DiCola, club president and player-coach.

"We are totally dedicated to hockey," Jake Kisel said. "It's addictive. If I have the opportunity to play hockey, a two-hour drive isn't much. I'd drive six hours to play hockey because I love it.

"And I think I speak for the whole team."

The players will have added incentive next month, as K-State is scheduled to join the Central College Hockey Association as a Division II member.

"Getting into Division II is on an invitation basis," DiCola said. "After KU dropped out, Missouri recommended to replace KU with our team in the league."

Becoming a member of the league is nice recognition for the club, DiCola said. Especially since the hockey team was formed in January 1990.

But the team is aware that playing in the league could make for a tough season.

"It will be definitely be a hard test for us because we just popped into the league," Kisel said. "It will be excellent competition."

DiCola said the biggest adjustment for the team will be the change from modified contact to full-contact hockey.

"I think we have a good team together," DiCola said. "We're now starting to play as a team. All the teams we have seen so far which are in the league, I think we can beat."

Division members include Iowa State, St. Louis, Drake and Missouri.

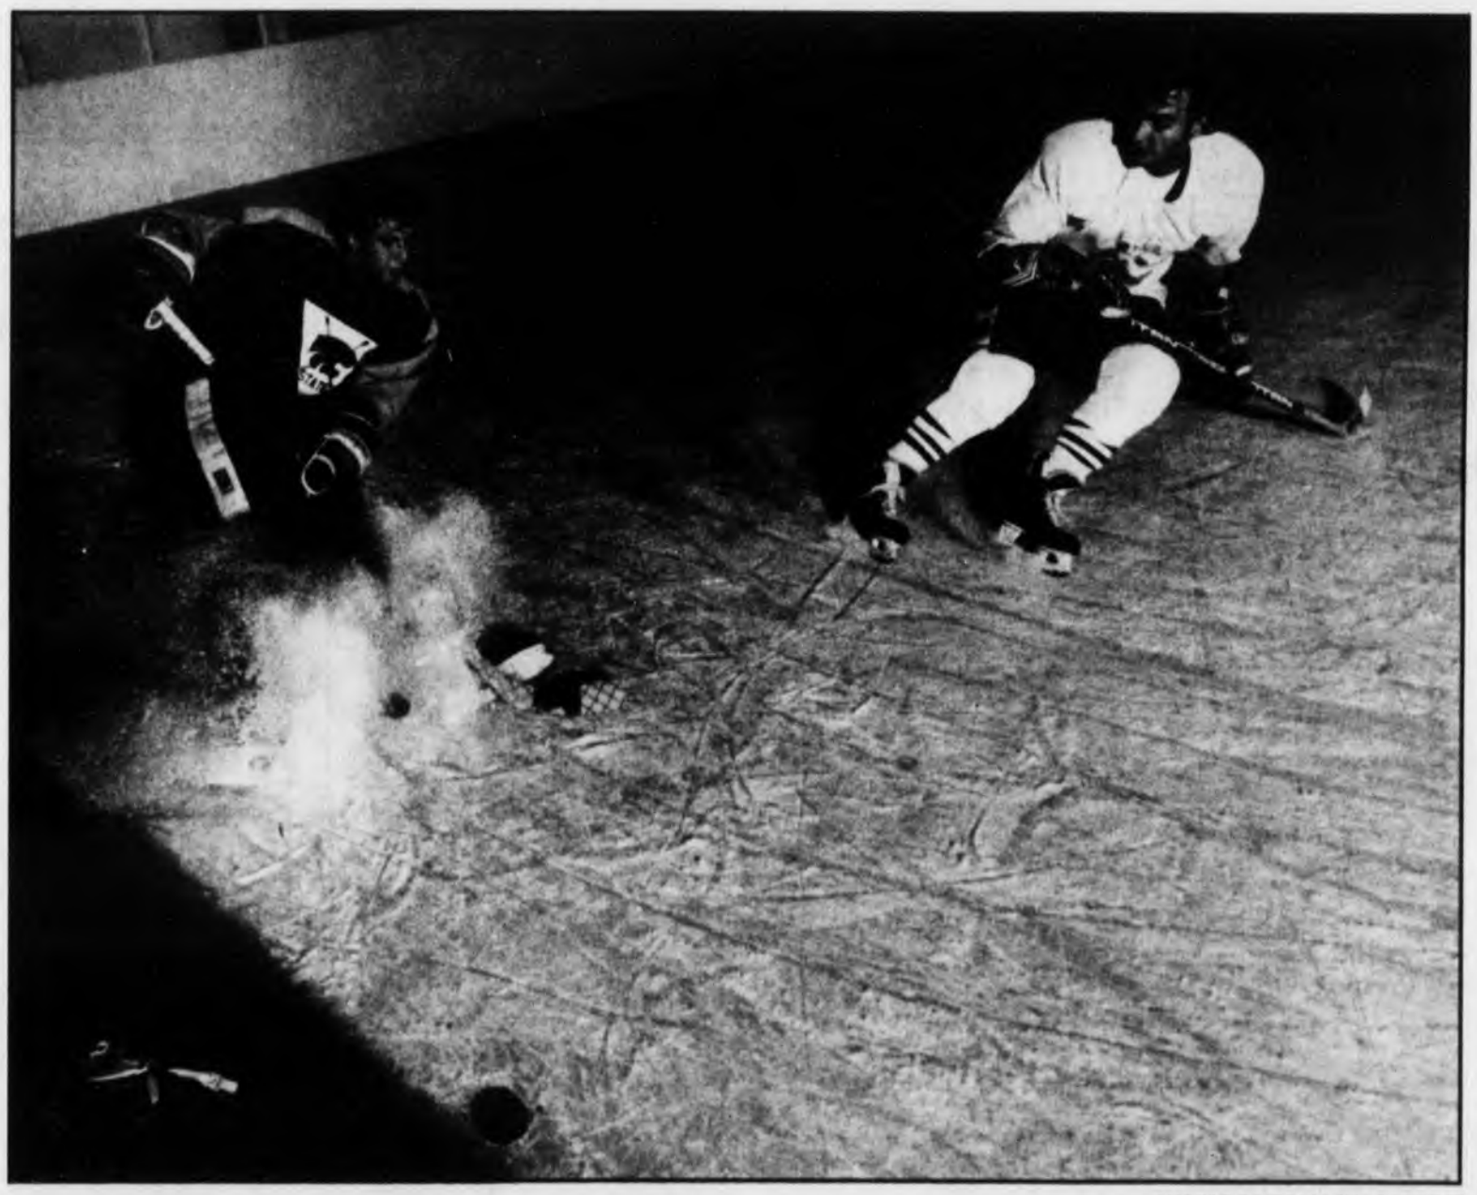
"Everybody who steps on the ice for K-State will know that he's ready to play Division II hockey," Kisel said. "Each player has to be ready to get hit hard. If not, it's better for the team and the player to tell us. But every player on the team has played Division II before on other teams and knows what's going on."

But for the new Division II team, conditions for practice aren't the best. The club has stopped making trips to St. Joseph each Sunday, and is currently practicing at the ice arena in Manhattan City Park every Tuesday and Thursday night at 8.

The problem with the arena in Manhattan is that it is too small for a regular hockey practice.

"We practice a lot on 1-on-1 defensive play, on tackling and on shots, which gives the goalies good practice," DiCola said. "But we can't really practice match situations.

"On a small rink, it is easier to tackle players and to control them. But it is a disadvantage because on the big size rink, the opponent has more room to go around you, something we can't practice."



Kisel said that K-State players eliminate the disadvantage with their attitudes.

"For other teams that practice every day it is just a normal thing to play us," he said. "For us, it's a high event."

Team members work together in off-court activities to meet travel and equipment expenses. The club is attempting to create enough interest from students to charter a bus to St. Joseph that would bring hockey fans to the games.

K-State, which is looking for a head coach to relieve DiCola of some of his duties, will try to finish in the top four of its division. Those teams qualify for a postseason tournament.

For club members, it is not an immediate goal, but nevertheless a consideration.

Vlasic to start for KC in place of DeBerg

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Mark Vlasic, who has started only three games in his four-year career, will replace 15-year veteran Steve DeBerg at quarterback when the playoff-bound Kansas City Chiefs meet San Francisco Saturday, Coach Marty Schottenheimer said Wednesday.

"Given the opportunity to perform, Mark has met the challenge. Steve's been struggling," Schottenheimer said after practice. "My feeling is, for us to win against San Francisco, Mark gives us the best opportunity. Let's face it — there's always a certain amount of uncertainty because he hasn't had a great deal of playing time in recent weeks."

The Chiefs, 9-5, clinched an AFC wild-card berth Sunday when Vlasic replaced DeBerg in the second half and engineered a come-from-behind 20-17 overtime victory over San Diego. DeBerg, who threw only four interceptions all last season, has thrown eight in his last four outings.

DeBerg threw three interceptions in the first half against San Diego, including one that was returned 71 yards for a touchdown and another that was nullified by one of the Chargers' team-record 14 penalties. However, the Chiefs have won 24 of their last 35 regular-season games with DeBerg as quarterback for all but about four quarters.

Vlasic was 12-for-18 for 150 yards and a touchdown against the Chargers. For the year, he has hit 26 of 38 for 292 yards and two touchdowns.

"I came in and said, 'Okay, what's the secret?'" Vlasic said. "He said, 'You're the starter.' I was excited to hear that. I didn't know what it was going to be. I felt good that if I got the chance I could make the best of it."

Schottenheimer emphasized he intends to keep Vlasic in the lineup as long as the Chiefs keep going in the post-season. They close out the regular season at San Francisco Saturday and at the Los Angeles Raiders Dec. 22.

"I fully expect Mark will continue as our starter. This is not a trial-run type of deal," Schottenheimer said. "Mark gives us the ability to throw the ball down the field with a little more accuracy than we've experienced."

DeBerg asked to speak to the team after Schottenheimer made his choice known.

"I just wanted to let the team know how I felt about it and that Mark Vlasic had my support," he said. "I felt it was important they know I understand the situation and that it's important for us to stay together as a team."

In his 15-year career, DeBerg has frequently been replaced. He has a history of rebounding strong after being benched.

"As I explained to Steve, that was not a specific issue that made the decision for me," Schottenheimer said.

tinuing Education also charge on-campus fees, said Doug King, director of Continuing Education.

It's not really something we want to do, said Linda Morse, administrative officer of Continuing Education.

"But if students taking classes on campus have to pay, then students taking classes through Continuing Education on campus should have to pay," she said.

Intersession is considered an academic term in itself and not as a part of the fall or spring semesters, Morse said. Intersession, then, has its own set of fees.

The Board of Regents requested that the student and health fees charged by Continuing Education be based on the current part-time campus privilege fee used for the fall and spring semesters which totals $78.35.

The $3.75 is computed by dividing the $78.35 by 21 days, which equals $3.73 and is rounded up to $3.75.

The fee is computed based on 21 days because that is the average number of class days that Continuing Education classes last, said Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance.

The fee applies to any on-campus Continuing Education classes or conferences, including intersession courses.

Winter Intersession is 13 days long, beginning Jan. 2 and ending Jan. 14. If $78.35 were divided by 13, the cost per day would be $6.03 per day. Using the 21-day estimate as an average works in favor of intersession students, he said.

Continuing Education has debated the equity of the fee, King said.

"It makes a lot of sense for on-campus classes," he said. "If they're on campus, they have the ability to use the services.

"But I'm not sure we like the structure of it," he said.

Currently, $1.20 of the $3.75 is for health services, and the remaining $2.55 is for other student services such as Recreational Services, the K-State Union, Student Publications and KSDB-FM.

The Student Fee Task Force, consisting of faculty and administrative representatives, will begin reviewing all student fees, including the Continuing Education fees, before the end of the semester.

"It's a great teaching point. I hope we realize that we're not ready. The people in the game were just not ready for it. It's something that were going to have to work on."

K-State, 1-5, trailed by 29 at the 7:40 mark, 62-33. But K-State went on a 12-point run over the next five and a half minutes, to cut the lead to a more respectable 62-45.

Moylan was the only other Lady Cat to reach double figures, scoring 11 points.

Sophomore Melody Howard led all scorers with 22 points in 28 minutes. She added four steals.

heard-of idea. Archer said other universities have split them to better serve clients and to better concentrate their efforts on both.

Increased efficiency and space isn't the only thing the parking services move has going for it. Trent Kelley, junior in business and a student employee, said the location of the new office is an advantage to the student parking officers.

"Since the new office will be more centrally located and in the middle of campus, it will suit the student employees better, because of the walking involved with our job."

Seaton gets fire safety project

Four-phase plan calls for non-flammable stairs, extra exits into corridor

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

Seaton Hall occupants now have a reason to smile with the passage of a new building fire safety project.

William Jahnke, assistant dean of the College of Architecture and Design, said the wood construction of Seaton's interior and the overcrowded conditions of Seaton studios make the building susceptible to destruction by fire.

Jahnke said Seaton was originally built for a milling area, and the hall was not originally intended to be used as it is presently.

Students who use Seaton agreed it is a dangerous place to be in the event of a fire.

"Our major facilitates for us to be there a lot and that we have a lot of drawings there," Jeff Sherrard, junior in architecture, said.

"Since we are there a lot, people bring in things to make it comfortable which makes the rooms too crowded."

Upon the realization that these fire hazards should be minimized, Jahnke came up with a proposal to make the areas of Seaton and Seaton Court more fire safe. Jahnke met with President Jon Wefald and his committee May 30 to discuss this proposal which was approved.

The fire-safety corrections will be made into a four-phase project with each phase lasting one year. It will start at the beginning of 1992 and will continue for four years, assuming funding is not cut.

The funding comes from special University maintenance funds, and the work will be done by the Division of Facilities.

One of the largest parts of the project will include making the stairs safer. They will be made of a non-flammable material and will be in completely enclosed areas, which eliminates the probability of fire spreading to the stairwells. Entrances to the stairwells will have doors with wired glass windows and will open inward.

Another major part of Seaton's upgrading is the building of fire corridors which are totally enclosed fireproof areas. Each room will exit into the corridors. Jahnke said this would be a big bonus, because many of the rooms are connected, and there is a possibility of a fire in a room that someone would have to pass through to escape.

The project will begin with modifications to the stairways in Seaton Court.

Jahnke said he is pleased with the decision to allow fire safety improvements. He said he has been hoping for such improvements in Seaton since he came to K-State in 1968.

"We're getting there, and we're happy to be getting it," Jahnke said. "The president did a lot last summer and was helpful in ordering immediate corrections."

the courtroom when the verdict was read. Among those absent was his uncle, Sen. Edward Kennedy, whose name had been sullied by his link to the case. Witnesses testified that he roused his son Patrick and Smith to go drinking early on March 30 at the disco where Smith said he was picked up by the woman.

The case was the latest in many crises for the Kennedys and a blow to the senator's political career, confirming his rumored life as a carouser. He promised his constituents he would reform. And just this week, Patrick Kennedy, a Rhode Island state legislator, confirmed he had been treated for a drug addiction when he was in high school.

Circuit Judge Mary Lupo thanked the jurors, saying "You have done justice regardless of your verdict."

She noted the trial had been televised live across the country.

"This has not been a movie made for TV," she told them. "The TV has come into the courtroom. The only difference between this case and any other is that more people want to see this case."

She told jurors it was up to them whether they wanted to talk publicly about their decision, but "I need to tell you that you are the story now."

Prosecutor Moira Lasch left without comment.

As Black left the courtroom, he said he felt "terrific, just terrific."

"I feel great, just great!" said Smith's mother, Jean Kennedy Smith.

Sen. Kennedy, who had testified in the case, spoke to reporters briefly Wednesday night outside the John F. Kennedy Federal Building in downtown Boston.

"I'd always believed that after all the facts were in, that Will would be found innocent," Kennedy said. "My heart goes out to Will, who I love very much."

"If there's anything good that has come out of this whole long experience, it's the renewed closeness of our family and friends," he said.

In Rhode Island, Patrick Kennedy said: "This has been a very difficult time for my family. I believed in my cousin Willie's innocence all along. The jury's swift verdict will now allow Willie and all of us to get on with our lives."

Smith graduated from Georgetown University Medical School this year. He hopes to begin his residency at the University of New Mexico Medical Center in Albuquerque next month, his family said. School officials said they will talk to Smith before deciding anything.

Judge

Flexibility usually is allowed for unexpected twists and turns. But the Palm Beach county circuit judge was adamant: Her jury would be sequestered and she would have them home by Dec. 20.

The jurors wound up going home nine days before that.

Lupo decreed 9 1/2-hour court days with an hour for lunch and two short bathroom breaks, ordered the courthouse open for weekend sessions and urged jurors to deliberate at night.

"I guess I am known for being industrious," she told jurors last week as a witness stepped down from the stand seven minutes before the day's recess at 6 p.m. She then ordered in another witness.

Last week, she refused to let the prosecution call a rape expert as a witness, because his appearance might delay proceedings for a few days.

"The court finds the addition of a witness such as this would have a devastating effect on the schedule of this trial," Lupo said while conceding that the witness might have had a significant impact.

Lupo also kept the public gallery in line.

"There will be no sighing, gasping, audible responses or anything else in the presence of the jury," she said before closing arguments.

On Monday, she evicted a Newsweek reporter for smiling during graphic sexual testimony.

A native of Albany, N.Y., Lupo, 43, attended Georgetown University Law School. In 1978, at age 30, she was the first woman to be appointed to the Palm Beach County court. She was elected to the circuit court in 1984.

She is married to attorney Edward Ricci, and they have a son, 12, and daughter, 18. Her hobbies are many; she recently took lessons in tap dancing.

During the trial, Lupo exhibited two major concerns — preventing a mistrial and avoiding reversal on appeal. Thus, her rulings often have weighed toward the defense.

"The defense has the best weapon in the world, a judge who's ruling in favor of the defense. It's very rare."

In 1990, 22,084 lives were lost to alcohol involvement in traffic crashes. Many people wonder what they can do to stop the impaired driving crashes this holiday season.
Here are four ideas that work:
• Never let a friend drive drunk.
• Have plenty of food and soft drinks at your parties.
• Be the designated driver.
• Wear your seat belt every trip.

Student to promote rodeo

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

Heather Lynn, senior in agricultural business and the1992 Kansas Rodeo Queen, takes a practice run through the barrels on her horse, Trigger. Lynn, who was crowned at Dodge City Days, will officially begin her reign Jan. 1. She will help at about 50 rodeos this year.

Miss Rodeo Kansas to compete for national title next December

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

To most people, Heather Lynn, senior in agricultural business, appears to be an ordinary K-State student. But those on the rodeo circuit know her as the 1992 Miss Rodeo Kansas.

Lynn, who was crowned Aug. 3 at Dodge City Days, will officially begin her reign Jan. 1, 1992. She said her duties as Miss Rodeo Kansas include appearances at about 50 rodeos around Kansas and in surrounding states.

"The pageant is a way to promote the sport of rodeo and be involved in it all at once," she said. "Some of my duties include helping to coordinate rodeos, writing press releases, signing autographs for children and generally helping out wherever I am needed at the rodeo."

Lynn said candidates for the title are judged in a number of categories, including appearance, personality and horsemanship. Some of the requirements in each category include personal interview, speech, written test, impromptu questions and modeling.

Because the competition is a scholarship pageant, the winner receives money and prizes. Lynn said she received a $1,000 scholarship, boots, a saddle, gift certificates and other accessories.

Although she has not officially begun her reign, Lynn said she is familiar with the duties because of the current Miss Rodeo Kansas, her former K-State roommate, Bobbie Ward.

Ward said she is sitting out a semester from K-State to prepare for the national pageant. She represented Kansas in the Miss Rodeo America pageant Dec. 2-8 in Las Vegas, Nev., for the chance to promote the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association throughout the country.

Ward said she decided to enter the pageant last year because of her love of the sport.

"Rodeo is becoming popular, but it needs more promotion," she said. "I want to promote the humane aspect of the sport I enjoy while also receiving money to further my education."

Ward said she plans to return to K-State next spring and hopes to complete a degree in home economics education in May 1993.

Lynn, who will graduate this coming spring, will compete for the national title next December.

Law might affect future of students

Student loan borrowers must obtain credit reports

MELLISSA PETERS
Collegian Reporter

A bill President Bush signed into law Nov. 15 may keep some people from attending college.

For years, college students have been able to obtain their education through a guaranteed student loan. However, because of a rider to Public Law 102-164, an unemployment bill, students who previously were able to receive one of these loans may now be out of luck.

The law was passed by Bush in order to pay for part of the cost of the bill extending unemployment benefits by reducing the spending in the student loan program, said Annita Huff, assistant director of student financial assistance.

"With the new law," Huff said, "a lender must obtain at least one credit report for individuals who are age 21 or older as of July 1 of the award year for which a Part B loan is sought.

"Any potential borrower who has an 'adverse credit history' in the opinion of the lender must obtain a creditworthy cosigner for the loan," she said. "In addition to the credit check, the lender may charge the cost of the credit check to the loan applicant. Such a cost must be the lower of the actual cost of the credit check or $25."

Reactions to the new law have been varied, and for the most part, negative.

"Guaranteed student loans were designed to help those who don't have credit ratings," Karren Baird-Olson, instructor of sociology, said. "This law is going to attack those people who need the most help."

Gus Dominguez, associate director of student financial assistance, said, "In my opinion, Congress just wants to show that it is doing something about the high default rate on student loans," said Gus Dominguez, associate director of student financial assistance, "and they are doing this by having credit checks on college students."

Now that the College of Technology in Salina has been taken in by K-State, the student governments of K-State-Salina and K-State are beginning the process of integration.

The Student Governing Association presented a draft proposal, which contains six key points, to the K-State-Salina student government in early November and received a response to it a few days later.

The SGA will recognize the Salina student government as the K-State College of Technology Council-Salina. This would make the K-State-Salina campus similar to a college council, with some exceptions due to its distance from Manhattan.

The plan would expand the Student Senate to include the Salina campus. There would be one student representative for every 300 students with a possible minimum of two student representatives from K-State-Salina.

The K-State-Salina SGA would retain complete control over Salina campus specific student activity fees. SGA would in no way be able to use Salina's student fees.

The president of the K-State-Salina Council would become the K-State SGA student body vice president-Salina. This would also allow him to become a member of the Student Senate Executive Committee and the student body president's cabinet. If approved, the merger would create two vice presidents at K-State, one from Manhattan and one from Salina.

Besides enabling the K-State-Salina students to vote for their Senate representatives and other officers of the K-

Regents plan calls for qualified admissions

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents would intensify its campaign for qualified admissions, push for improved faculty pay and set desirable enrollment ranges for Kansas' six universities under its compromise strategic mission development plan.

The plan, a fusing of one developed by the board's staff and one drafted by the university Council of Presidents, was made public Thursday.

Regents Chairman Jack Sampson of Hutchinson appointed a special committee that met Monday in Salina and reconciled differences in the two plans.

The compromise mission statement is aimed at ending a disagreement between the university presidents and Regents Executive Director Stanley Koplik over a proposal Koplik unveiled in late summer, which was widely interpreted as an attempt to centralize control over higher education in Topeka.

"The board states unequivocally that centralization of administrative authority is not the intent of the current mission review," the revised mission development statement says. "The board intends to retain the present system of strong leadership on the campuses and on its staff.

"The board relies on its executive director and staff to ensure good communication and appropriate information to the board and (relies on) the universities to implement the institutional missions and the policies of the board in an intellectually and fiscally responsible manner."

A regents statement accompanying release of the plan also said, "The mission document will guide the Kansas regents universities until the year 2000 and will initiate campus strategic planning over the next year, culminating with campus mission

17 arrested in drug raid

Police find drugs, stolen property in two local residences

HEATHER SMITH
Collegian Reporter

On Wednesday, 25 Riley County police officers swarmed two Manhattan residences in the vicinity of Yuma Street and arrested 17 people.

The people ranged in age from 18 to 51 years old.

Capt. Allen Raynor of RCPD said there are two kinds of dope dealers — the ones they've caught and the ones they're going to catch.

With this drug raid, Raynor said, the RCPD has switched from a covert program to a pro-active program.

This raid was sponsored by a $43,000 grant from the Kansas Criminal Justice Anti-drug program and $12,000 contribution from the county. The investigation consisted of two undercover investigators, 25 officers who conducted the actual raid and delivered the search warrants, and the Junction City Police Department drug dog.

"The message this sends to Manhattan is that we are not asleep, and if you're selling cocaine, be careful who you sell it to," Raynor said.

Raynor said the RCPD really didn't confiscate a lot of drugs, but the purpose was to get the suspects to sell to undercover agents.

In addition to the drugs, the officers also discovered a large amount of stolen property. Raynor said the value of the stolen property was from $7,000 to $8,000. At the same time, he said, there had been a rash of burglaries in the neighborhood where the arrests took place.

"I certainly hope this sends the message that the police are actively looking to intercept drug sellers, buyers and users," Riley County District Attorney Bill Kennedy said. "There are nicer ways to get your name in the paper."

The officers made the 17 arrests with a variety of different charges such as sell of cocaine, LSD and marijuana. All of the people charged were charged with failure to obtain a drug stamp tax. One was charged with robbery, and another was charged with stolen property.

Kennedy said if the person convicted for selling cocaine was a first-time offender, the penalty is usually from three to 10 years in prison. He also said the judge would consider the amount of the drug confiscated as a part of the sentencing.

Campaign uses student's work

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian Reporter

Miscommunication between a K-State student and the KSU Student Foundation has left her wondering why she was never told her ideas would be used to improve the Books and Bricks Campaign.

Shannon Matthew, senior in journalism and mass communications, said she developed Books and Bricks promotional material for her public relations class.

"The more I worked on the project, the more I became interested in it," Matthew said. "I felt like I could really improve the existing campaign."

She took her campaign to Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, and Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean of libraries, in March. From there, it was given to the Student Foundation, which is the sponsor of Books and Bricks.

She said she didn't hear anything from the Student Foundation for eight months until she received a Books and Bricks brochure in the mail — the brochure she designed.

"I was shocked to see that the brochure was almost exactly like the one I designed," Matthew said. "I had expected to hear from them before any work was to be done."

Brad Brenneman, former chairman of the campaign, said several attempts were made to contact Matthew.

"We searched all over trying to find records of where she was," Brenneman said. "We tried to get a hold of her, but her phone was disconnected."

Since the Student Foundation could not reach Matthew, and a decision was made to talk to the marketing department. They were told there should be no problem using Matthew's campaign materials since she offered to help revise the Books and Bricks campaign.

"I'm not at all upset that my work was used," Matthew said. "I was never a part of the production of the brochure. I would just like to be able to evaluate its effectiveness and get some feedback on it."

McCulloh and Matthew are currently trying to find out what person within the Student Foundation handled the campaign, so they can get together and find out what parts of the campaign were used and how effective they were.

"She had very good material," Glennis Carlson, director of the KSU Foundation, said. "Her ideas were constructive, and her points were good."

"We were very pleased with Matthew's efforts," McCulloh said. "I'm very appreciative of her work."

"Karen and I will meet with Shannon to see if there is a problem," Carlson said. "We will meet next week and discuss the whole thing."

Winter commencement ceremonies Saturday

The future starts Saturday for 1,139 K-State students.

December commencement ceremonies will be at 9 a.m. in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We expect about 1,000 to be in attendance Saturday," Vice Provost Robert Kruh said.

He said that number is fairly consistent with the turnout among eligible graduates last year.

The ceremony will last until about 11 a.m.

The seating capacity of Bramlage is close to 9,000 for the ceremony, said Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, since part of the coliseum is behind the stage.

"You're usually looking at 6,000 to 7,000 people for December,"

Rankin to leave position with homeless shelter

Director takes job
in Olathe after 7 years of Manhattan service

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

For seven years, Manhattan's homeless have turned to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Inc. for assistance. But next year, MESI will no longer have Kathy Rankin to lean on for support.

Rankin is resigning as the director of MESI to take a position in Olathe as the housing program manager. Rankin applied for the position, saying it would enable her to "work on federal and state projects, write grants and expand the housing programs in Olathe."

Melanie Brockington, MESI case manager, will serve as the interim director until a permanent director is selected, possibly in January.

Rankin has been an active member of several local organizations. She has served on the Transportation Task Force for Riley County, the Advisory Board for Manhattan Housing, the Riley County Council of Social Agencies and was nominated to the group Future Manhattan, Class of 1990. Currently, she has a position on an advisory board for the Office of Housing for Kansas.

Rankin said MESI has provided aid for 2,000 to 3,000 people in seven years, and most of those people have been Manhattan residents.

When MESI first opened in 1985, a staff of two could only provide a "bed and breakfast style" of aid for the homeless, Rankin said. Over the years, more comprehensive support has been added, and the staff was gradually boosted to today's 11.

In 1987, the United Nations International Year of the Shelter for the Homeless Award was given to MESI for providing exceptional service to the homeless. MESI was the only recipient from Kansas.

Riley County District Attorney Bill Kennedy used to be on the board of directors for the emergency shelter.

"MESI is a wonderful organization, and it has progressed a great deal. It's more than a shelter," he said. "I think it has developed its goal of being more than just a place to stay. Kathy is a fine person and has worked hard to raise money for that organization. I'm sad that she's leaving. It will be a loss to the community."

In fact, one of the worst aspects of being a non-profit organization is worrying whether or not they will make it through the year, Kennedy said.

Keeping costs down can be done in a variety of ways. The two-story house occupied by MESI is leased to them by the First Presbyterian Church for

Cabinet, Senate roles filled

Senators address
ASK policies, commend Baldwin for Marshall

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

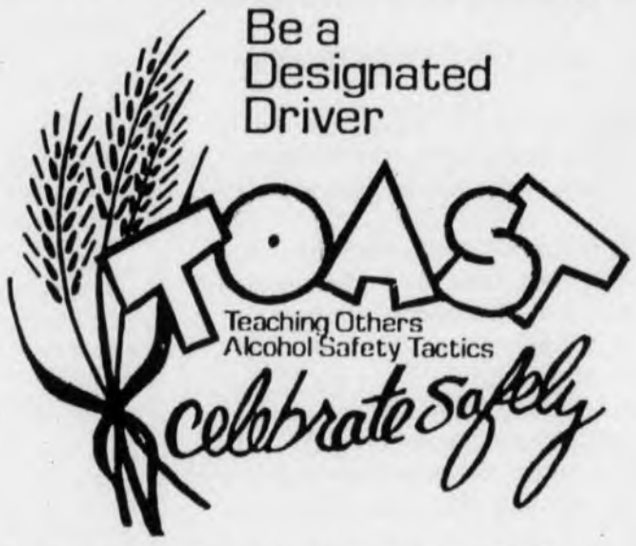
Student appointments to various positions were approved during Student Senate's one-hour Thursday night meeting, its last of the semester.

Jim Persinger, junior in political science, was named as chief of staff and Mike Porter, junior in history, was voted in as attorney general.

Other students were approved to positions as chairpersons for Student Senate's standing committees, for the student body president's cabinet and a parliamentarian was selected. Senators were also assigned to the various senate committees.

Chris Baldwin, senior in chemical engineering and recipient of a Marshall scholarship, received a commendation from the senators for having "shown excellence in academics and student leadership throughout his undergraduate career," as stated in the resolution.

Engineering Sen. Neil Neaderhiser said, "It's standard for us to congratulate academic success."



Issues to be addressed by the Associated Students for Kansas Policy Council were also listed. Some of those issues included capital improvements, which would include Farrell Library, and GTA fee waivers.

Senate standing rules for 1992 were eventually passed after an amendment proposed by Neaderhiser was debated and defeated. Standing rules are guidelines that clarify how Senate meetings shall be run and what legislative procedures and attendance policies are, among other things.

GTAs Students lose out in fight for improvements

There is no question the English department GTAs have it rough — even unfair. They have more students and more classes and, evidently, are getting paid about $300 less than GTAs in other departments. But things just aren't much better anywhere else on this campus.

University classes have been cut and canceled due to lack of the stuff that makes the world go around — money. Now classes through the Community Enrichment Program are also being cut.

And off campus, most of us can't even afford the holidays this year.

It is understandable that the GTAs are frustrated to the point of wanting to strike. And fighting the system is cool, but it shouldn't interfere with students getting their grades.

To hold grades back for two weeks after they are due, Dec. 23, is less than mature. Sure, the students will still get their grades, but a great deal of someone's money will have to be spent on the separate mailing. This kind of revenge doesn't accomplish anything.

The GTAs have a valid argument that they have undesirable working conditions and are not properly compensated, but arguments for more copy machines and desks just aren't realistic. Equipment and office space are scarce everywhere on campus.

But teaching has long been a thankless job for which the only real reward is enriching minds.

In the midst of all their demands, the English GTAs seem to have forgotten the impressionable freshmen in Composition I who didn't ask to get caught between them and the administration. And, ultimately, the GTAS are making the students — the ones for whom they are setting an example — suffer.

Open admissions not closed subject

The policy of admitting all Kansas high school graduates to the Kansas Board of Regents university of their choice is under fire once again.

This time, it's the Manhattan Board of Education. In its Dec. 4 meeting, the board voted 6-1 to support a statewide proposal for qualified admissions. The question is, "Why?"

These board members, like others before them, think the implementation of qualified admissions will result in better-prepared students. In a time of shrinking budgets and strained resources, the argument is that we can no longer afford to admit those who aren't quite college material.

Good arguments. But there's another side to the picture.

A high grade point average, foreign language skills and an impressive smile are not guarantees of college success. A lack of these things is not a guarantee of failure, either.

All college students can point to a person who was a success in high school and then came to college and failed. By that same token, all college students can think of a person whose high school career wasn't that impressive, but he or she did OK in college.

In voting against the proposal, board member Merle Wilson said he believed all students should have a chance to fail.

Very true. And all students should have a chance to succeed as well.

The OU, NU buyout

K-State Athletic Director Milt Richards has saved the Big Eight from a financial catastrophe. Richards has put together a football revenue package which will keep Nebraska and Oklahoma from leaving the conference.

The problem stems from the national TV appearance fee paid to Big Eight teams. Long-time football powerhouses Nebraska and OU received 22 percent of their appearance fee. But with the age of teams jumping to other conferences and forming mega-conferences, NU and OU looked to jump ship. The appearance fee had become unacceptable, and the talk of moving out of the Big Eight increased.

The new plan, masterminded by Richards, will give any Big Eight team appearing in a nationally televised game on ESPN or ABC 40 percent of the appearance fee next year, 60 percent the following year and 80 percent the year after.

The plan has been accepted by conference schools, and K-State will be a member of the Big Eight next year, not the Little Six.

Applaud Milt Richards for his work in keeping the conference together, but boo schools like Nebraska and Oklahoma and laugh at those who are too interested in how much cash their amateur teams can roll in.

It is indeed a sad day when more precedence is given to sports income and athletic prestige than academic achievement.

But what the hell, old news is no news.

Writing columns not always easy task

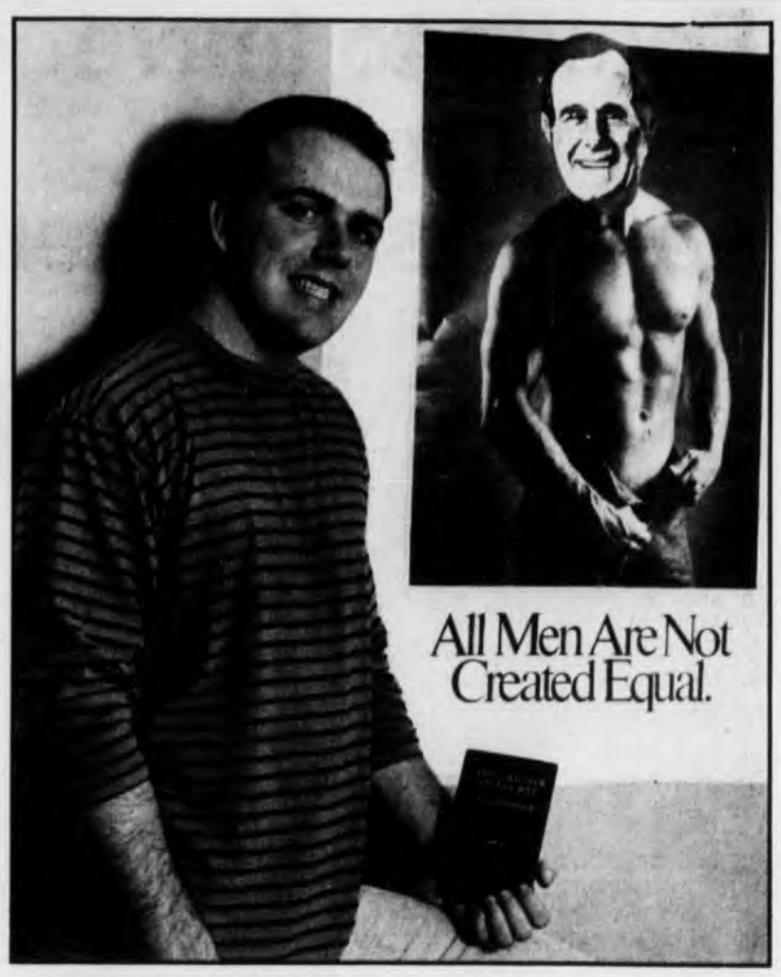
I suppose I always thought that when I wrote my columns, they were in essence already there, hidden within the confines of the paper, waiting to be uncovered. As the writer, it was simply my job to chip away the unnecessary material and reveal their presence, much as a sculptor does with a block of marble.

But as I sat down to write the final column of the final Collegian of the 1991 year, I realized there was no stone to be carved, no column encased inside, my mind seemingly as blank as the way I left most of the questions on my last statistics test.

Surely, Michelangelo never experienced such a problem.

So, not being able to blame my writer's block on PMS, I sat in my chair and pondered what I had written this past semester — what had been said and left unsaid and my various attempts to pull something relevant and concrete from a mass of journalistic dribblings, which at times issued forth so easily and other times seemed as though I had just given birth.

From this personal introspection, I concluded that a few things needed to be clarified in order to give those who bothered to read my columns a better understanding of why I wrote what I did.



First of all, aside from my writing, I've heard about that picture you've all seen, my mug shot. For all of you who commented about how overtly pissed-off I looked, I assure you I actually did smile for most of the pictures taken to be placed in the column.

I suppose my editors wanted to infuse a sense of seriousness into the reader and, in the process, made me look like someone who should have been called "Vinney" and breaking people's elbows for not paying their overdue gambling debts.

Really, I sometimes am a nice guy, as my new mug proves.

Second, I am not pro-life, or pro-choice, or anti-pro-life, or pro-anti-life, or any other Latin prefixes you care to come up with. When I flirted with journalistic suicide in writing my column on the "a" word, I simply hoped to show how ridiculous the entire matter has become, how it has made a mockery of the ideas of humanity and is now a vortex of hatred and a depository of inane ideals.

Ouch. I already know I'm going straight to hell for that one.

Third, Holden Caulfield did not — I repeat, did not — visit me in the mists of a bad acid trip when I was reading "The Catcher in the Rye," preparing for my article on book banning. It was a bad pot trip, and my Pink Floyd "The Wall" CD was skipping when he showed up.

Further, I was secretly paid by the Democratic Party to do all the George Bush bashing I engaged in. In fact, I actually do like the old guy. He certainly has been the biggest supply of cannon fodder for us scum, yellow journalists during the past three years. And just how can anybody not like a guy who hates broccoli more than a recession?

Also, I did go to the store with my girlfriend, but instead of making me stand next to her, she actually let me stand a few aisles away so no one would know I was there when she purchased her "feminine necessities." I also failed to mention the cool conversations I had with all the other fellows who were hiding between aisles waiting for their girlfriends to finish shopping.

Finally, if I had to write all of my columns again, I probably wouldn't change a thing. America is still a great country, but it is in dire straits, and the bills are coming due. Russia is currently paying hers. For all intents and purposes, K-State is still the best in Kansas. And I've only broken a few elbows in my time, so cut me some slack.

Merry Christmas, and see you next semester.

A word to the wise

BARRY FRIDLEY GUEST

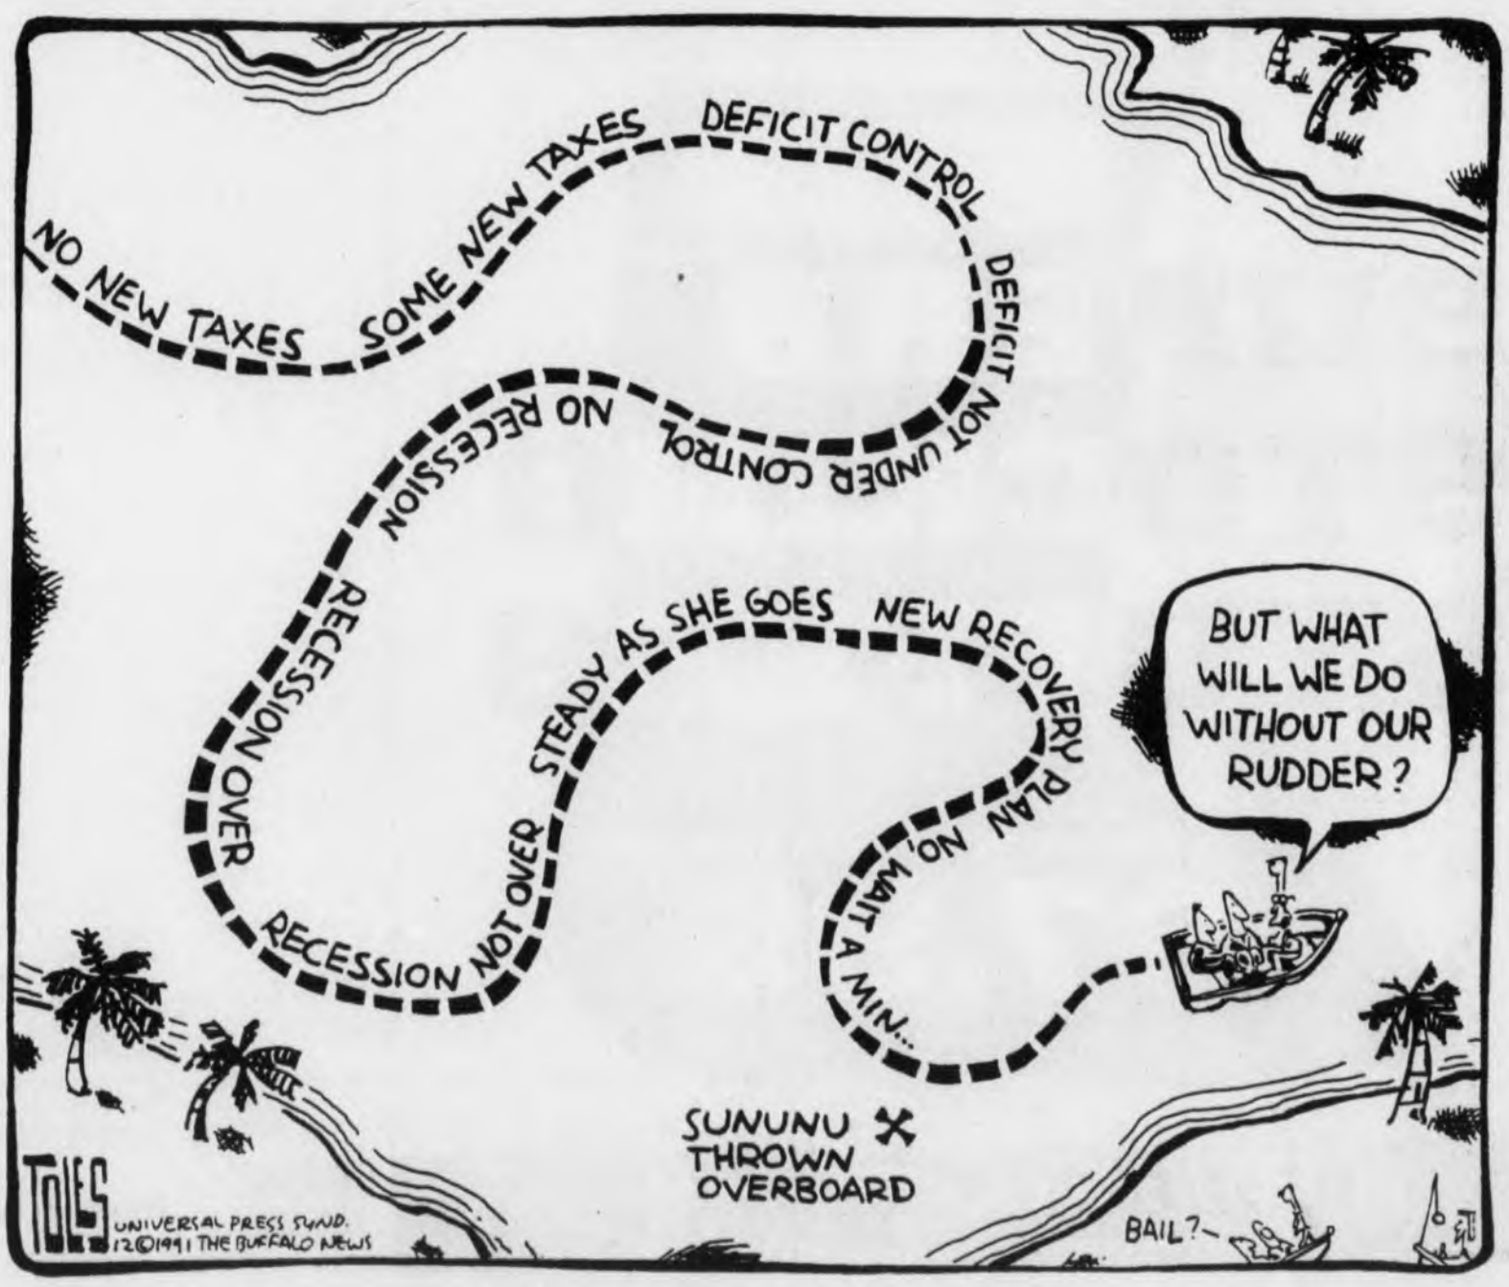
If job sounds too good to be true, it probably is

Barry Fridley is a sophomore in philosophy.

The life of a college student is at times challenging. It is not only challenging in the sense of academic achievement but also economic survival. Each day, students must calculate and budget to make ends meet. It is no easy task — unless you have a fruitful father or mother. However, most students must seek out opportunity in the work force. They must find a job with suitable hours along with comfortable pay. This weighty criteria is the bait for the famous "work-at-home projects."

Work-at-home projects are constantly advertised in the employment section of the newspaper. These jobs consist of envelope stuffing, assembly work and brochure mailing. These primary opportunities are only a few of the readily known work-at-home projects.

Work-at-home projects are designed for people who need extra money but have little time to spare for a regular part-time job. These jobs promise huge earnings with no experience necessary. The only catch is, the interested party — that being the job seeker — must invest a small, one-time and, of course, refundable fee. For the eager and needy college student, these job opportunities are ideal. However, before you run to a newsstand for the great opportunities, read on.



According to the Better Business Bureau of Northeast Kansas, businesses that are easy to get a job with, ensure unrealistic pay and are advertised as easy to do with no experience necessary are frauds. Of course, there are some jobs like that. However, the BBB explains, "Firms offering salaried home employment do not advertise, because they can get more workers than they need by word-of-mouth advertising."

So, what about the job opportunities in the paper that meet these factors?

According to the BBB, "work-at-home promoters" (that are frauds) never use street addresses and never have a company phone number. The reasons are quite obvious. However, the eager and gullible job seeker who needs a job may overlook this fact and end up losing money instead of gaining it."

So you might ask, why doesn't the government do something about these contemporary swindlers? For the work-at-home promoters that promise everything and only rip people off, beware. The U.S. Postal Service puts thousands of these swindlers out of business each year.

So, if you're seeking employment and have questions about any business or opportunity, call or write to the Better Business Bureau in your area.

The best and the worst of '91

'Point Break,' 'Boyz N the Hood' at opposite ends of Edmunds' spectrum

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

They were the best of times and the worst of times, wrote Charles Dickens.

I don't know whether Mr. Dickens could see into the future or not, but he might well have been talking about the vast array of movie releases audiences had to choose from in 1991.

REVIEW

The highs were captivating, exciting and entertaining. And the lows — well, more about them later. Even with the less-than-cosmopolitan selection of films that actually found their way to Manhattan, there certainly were a lot of choices — action, drama, laughter, new stars, old favorites, sequels and overpriced popcorn, too.

There were a lot of really good movies — darn good films — released this year, as well as a lot of perfectly nice, mid-range films like "The Doctor" and "Backdraft."

And then there are the stinkers. Trapped in a darkened theater for two hours with no plot, no character development and no Milk Duds. Talk about Hell on Earth.

When I say "worst" films of the year, I don't mean cheesy, low-budget bombs that end up on cable's USA Network in a year. I saw far too many really bad films in general release this year — films that seemingly intelligent friends raved about.

As for the worst films of the year, the list is easy to compile. These films stand head and shoulders above the rest in a number of departments.

My Top Five Worst Films of 1991?

"Point Break." Funny how so many of these bad films end up packing in the crowds when they play at the Union — maybe I'm the only one who was completely bored with this futile exercise from the Patrick Swayze smile-and-flex school of "acting."

"The Doors." Give me a break. Oliver Stone homogenizes yet another interesting story to where it is about as exciting as day-old oatmeal. Stone seems to be making a career of grave-robbing — "The Doors," the upcoming "JFK", propaganda and the rape of the written word ("Born on the Fourth of July" really was a good book). This was the biggest rock 'n' roll tragedy since Altamont.

"Sleeping with the Enemy" and "Dying Young." It's a toss-up as to which of these two is worse, but they were both purely awful films. Julia Roberts and Patrick Swayze get my vote for the worst non-actors working in Hollywood — getting by on a wing, a prayer and great hair.

"What About Bob?" This really hurts to even talk about, because I am a big fan of Bill Murray, but this film was a real stinker. Bill was pretty funny as a silly psycho who hassles his shrink on vacation, but he got no support from fundamental elements like a script or the rest of the cast. A stand-up comic like Billy Crystal or Robin Williams might have been able to pull off this fiasco, but Murray always has worked best in an ensemble, and he just couldn't breathe the necessary life into this patient. This one was definitely D.O.A.

"Terminator 2." Sorry, Arnold, but I won't be back. This was a pointless and unsatisfying flick with no plot, no characters worth even worrying about and a lot of neat little special effects. Not nearly enough to entertain anyone over the age of seven for two hours.

As for the best — and there were a lot of great films released this year — the list is always more difficult to compile. Keeping the list to the five best films of the year, I didn't want to leave out films like "Frankie and Johnny," "New Jack City," "Mortal Thoughts," and "The Godfather Part III." These four films may have sold fewer tickets than the big winners of 1991, but they were also great films. Don't miss them on video.

Speaking of video, it may be the only opportunity you have to see one of the year's best five films, as it has still not arrived in Manhattan. Eventually, it will probably show up on the UPC schedule, as well.

These are my picks as the best of 1991.

"Jungle Fever." You have to travel out of town to see it, but even with it's minor thematic flaws, this film is worth the trip. Spike Lee set out to explore interracial relationships, and does it well, but still comes off as a bit of a misogynist. His female characters still need some development — but in Hollywood, that seems to be the trend rather than the exception.

"City Slickers." This one is still playing in town, and if you missed it this summer, take time to catch it on the big screen. I laughed, I cried, I pictured myself right up there with Billy Crystal and the rest of the "dudes," playing out a John Wayne fantasy. I've seen it a half dozen times, and it still works for me. Crystal is good; Bruno Kirby is wonderful — it's a winner all around.

"Cape Fear." Another De Niro classic. This film is certainly not for the weak at heart. De Niro's portrayal of psycho killer Max Cady will stay with you for a long time. I'm still having bad dreams.

"Thelma and Louise." Is there anything left to be said about this film that has not already been said to death? It's great fun — a story of friendship, adventure, exploration and the outlaw in us all.

"Boyz N the Hood." This film blew me away. John Singleton, a 23-year-old first-time director, came up with one of the most moving stories seen on the screen in a long time. It's powerful, honest and a story that needs to be heard. This is not just a film about gangs or poor people living in South Central Los Angeles. This is a story about all of us and what has become of our hope, equality and the American dream. See this film — more than once.

Taking precautions prevents burglaries

JENNIFER RICHARDS
Collegian Reporter

Christmas break should not be linked to Christmas break-ins if students take precautionary measures to keep their possessions safe over the holidays.

Sgt. Stan Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department said every year there is an increase of burglaries during the Christmas season. Most often these burglaries could be prevented if precautionary measures were taken.

Conkwright gave many tips to help prepare for an extended absence of the home.

"Mail and newspapers should be stopped during vacations. Owners should have someone frequently check property and locks on doors and windows," he said.

Conkwright said there are a few indicators that burglars look for to see if a family may be on an extended leave from the home.

"During the winter months when snow is visible, you should have your driveway cleaned," he said. "Burglars can tell if a home is vacant if the snow is undisturbed.

"Also, the sidewalks should be cleaned 24 hours after a snow to avoid ticketing as city regulations state."

Students leaving for break should take all valuables with them over the holidays, Conkwright said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTS

SCOTT PASKE

Editor's last stand

Now I understand why Keith Amerson had tears in his eyes when he was introduced before his final home game as a Wildcat basketball player last season against Missouri.

In a lot of ways, the last time hurts. It's a happy pain, but nevertheless, it hurts.

It's the same way right now for yours truly. This is the end of the line for me on the sports staff of the Kansas State Collegian.

Contrary to popular belief, Collegian editors do graduate. And God willing, this one's out the door in a matter of days.

The cause of this empty feeling is the countless flashbacks I keep having of K-State sports memories over the past 4 1/2 years. The realization that once you've experienced something great, you never want it to end, is setting in.

Such is this fan's love affair with K-State sports.

As a sports writer, I've always tried to find something that Joe Fan may not have seen or heard when he watched or listened to a game. Insight, for me, has never been a way of saying, "Look what I know that you don't."

People want to know more than the final score. That's my opinion. And if there are those who feel differently, the six semesters they've had to tell me end today.

The flashbacks provide my insight for this final shot. And it's not all pom-pons, trophies and game-winning shots.

First, K-State athletes have feelings. Talk to them, and you realize it. Watching nose tackle Evan Simpson cry after the Cats' 16-12 win over KU, seeing Jean Derouillere wipe tears off his jersey after his last home game, and seeing Al Jones ring the Victory Bell by the Wildcat football locker room convinced me of that.

If it didn't, then trying to squeeze words out of John Rettiger and Tony Massop after Coach Lon Kruger's resignation in 1990 certainly did. Or waiting for Jeff Wires to give his best explanation for the Cats' struggles last year at Iowa State.

So many memories, so many flashbacks. Too many to mention.

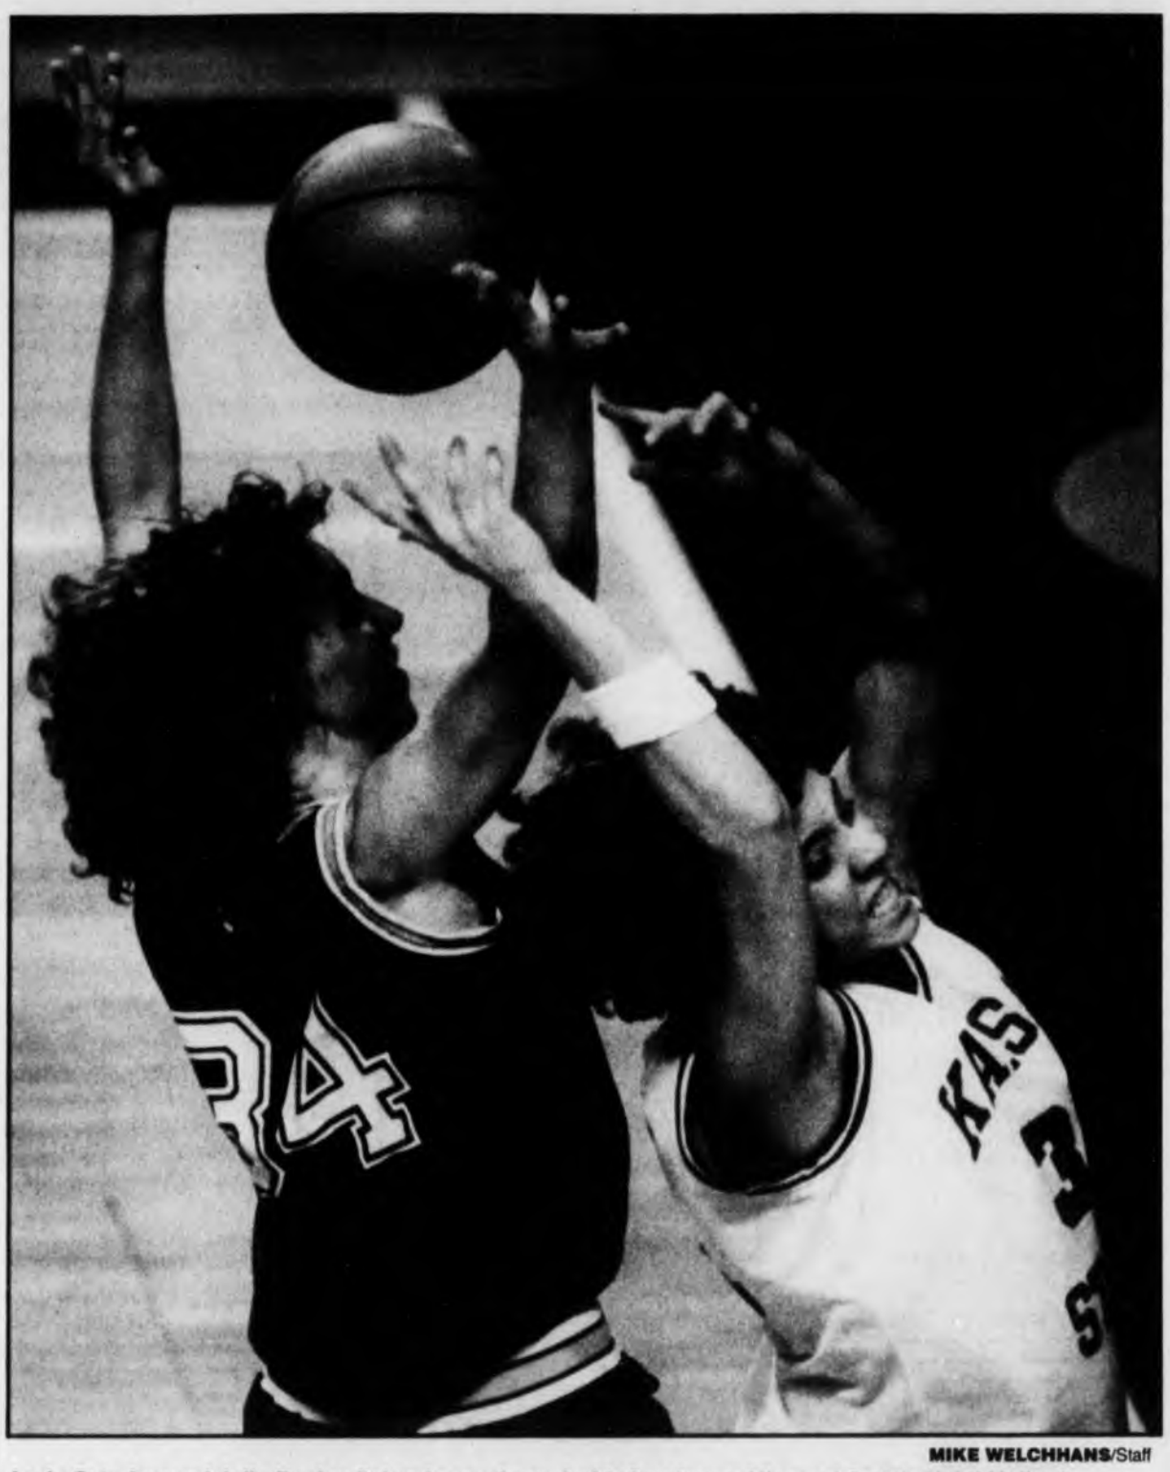
While the limelight of college athletics gives those involved a celebrity status, those who wear K-State uniforms have always seemed down to Earth. My personal favorites? Wylie Howard and Rogerick Green, although many others are not far behind.

I can tell many diehard fans share the same sentiment for Wylie. Ask anybody who was in the student section an hour before the Arkansas game Tuesday about the reception he was given as he walked across the Bramlage Coliseum floor to the locker room.

Man, oh man.

Green, who helped K-State to a 7-4 football record in his senior season, was always a difficult interview. I never asked all of the questions I had for him, because it was so easy to talk about off-the-field stuff.

A favorite coach? It's so tough to call, but baseball coach Mike Clark gets the nod. The reason doesn't sound like it was given much thought, but it doesn't have to.



Clark has a way of making you feel like you could walk into his house, kick your shoes off and not worry if your feet stink.

Then there's Bill Snyder, a person who requires far more than the remaining space to describe. I had the good fortune of spending a couple of hours interviewing him last summer.

Only the interview turned philosophical. And I walked out of his office ready to take on the world.

Finally, fans, I've sat across from you at Bramlage for three years, and my blood has curdled at the noise you make. Keep it up. It's incredible.

So long. And pass the Kleenex.

Lady Cats travel to Wichita State

Struggling teams look for spark with in-state battle

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Though it's not "the" intra-state rivalry, Saturday night's matchup between the Lady Cats and Wichita State in Wichita holds special significance to many of those involved.

These, it seems, are two teams that can probably relate to one another well. The Lady Cats are 1-5; the Shockers are 1-7. Neither team has a scorer that makes the opposition shake in its shoes.

But none of that matters, said Lady Cat coach Susan Yow, who is genuinely excited about the prospect of matching up with WSU.

"I really think it's for bragging rights," she said. "And I think in that situation, you go in with a lot of pressure on you.

"I'm sure they're thinking that this is the one game, should they get the win, that might turn it around for them. We're thinking the same kir of things."

Yow said the prospect of her tea battling the Shockers was exciting f another reason.

"The last three games we've playe we had to prepare above and beyon what we had in," Yow said in referenc to the Lady Cat offensive schem against Purdue, Miami-Ohio an Southwest Missouri State. "Again WSU, you don't really have to wor about doing anything but what you' comfortable with."

And this is no road-weary coach.

"We've played so much better o the road than we have at home," sai Yow, whose team's home win ove Oral Roberts would seem to contradic that statement somewhat. "I reall don't think being out there hurts us and it may really relax us."

Another thing that might potentiall relax Yow is the prospect that Mar Jo Miller, who failed to start a gam for just the second time in her fou years at K-State Wednesday night will likely see playing time agains WSU.

Cats to be tested over lesson

K-State's patience gets challenge from high-scoring Alabama State

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

After learning their first lesson on what it takes to play against the best basketball teams in the nation, the Wildcats are set to get back to their homework.

The 70-59 loss to 19th-ranked Arkansas brought to light many of the areas the Cats must improve upon, Coach Dana Altman said. Though the loss was a disappointing one, Altman said good things could come from it down the road.

"We maybe got a little too excited, maybe were running a little faster than we needed to," Altman said, acknowledging that for many Cats, it was the first experience in a major college game.

"It will be helpful for some of those guys to have the experience when we get into some other big games this season," he said.

In addition to shooting just 31.7 percent in the contest, Altman said turnovers and poor rebounding were major disappointments in the game.

Preparation for their next test — the Cats' last home game until January — is limited to just two practices. The Cats will try to get back on track Saturday against Alabama State.

"We need practice time to continue developing fundamentals, but we also need game time," Altman said. "The more we get out on the floor, the more comfortable these guys are going to become with what we're doing."

Alabama State brings a 2-3 mark into the contest, but finished second in the UAB Classic at the University of Alabama-Birmingham last weekend. Despite returning just three lettermen from last season, the Hornets posted wins over Samford and Northwestern (La.) State.

"They're a very athletic team from top to bottom," Altman said. "We're going to have to take care of the ball and be ready to work on defense."

The Cats face a big defensive challenge from Hornets' 6-foot-5 senior guard Steve Rogers. While K-State had trouble filling it up against the Razorbacks, Rogers certainly didn't. Rogers knocked down a season high 38 points against Arkansas in a losing effort last week.

Rogers finished fourth in the nation in scoring last season, recording 29.4 points per game. This season, the senior leads the Hornets with a 26.1 average, including a 33-point outburst against Clark-Atlanta.

"We definitely will have to know where he's at at all times," Altman said. "He's an awfully good scorer and he seems to have the other guys to support him. We'll have to work awfully hard to slow him down."

The Hornets fell to recent Wildcat opponent Arkansas 96-80 in Pine Bluff, Ark., Dec. 3. They were beaten in the tournament finale by the University of Alabama-Birmingham 83-61 Saturday. In that contest, Rogers was held to a season low 14 points.

Chadd hired

Former K-State baseball star David Chadd has been hired as an assistant coach for the Wildcats.

Chadd fills the vacancy left by Phil Morgan, who accepted a scouting job with the Pittsburgh Pirates earlier this fall.

Chadd, who earned All-American honors after hitting .418 with 11 home runs and 54 RBIs during the 1988 season, returns to the K-State program after serving as a graduate assistant at Wichita State. He will be Coach Mike Clark's only full-time assistant.

Deals dominate winter meetings

Plenty of teams rely on quick fix to be contenders

By the Associated Press

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. — It was nearly midnight on the final day of the frenzied winter meetings at the Fontainebleau Hotel when Lou Piniella ran into a set of Kansas City Royals officials in the lobby.

The Cincinnati manager was sauntering back to his room. The Royals were scurrying to announce two trades.

"Hey, what are you doing?" Piniella shouted. "Trying to upstage us?"

Within moments, the Royals told everyone they had moved seven more players. And yes, they had traded Bret Saberhagen, the pitcher who said he thought he was a fixture in the franchise, a player who said he felt he'd stay in Kansas City forever.

"That's the part you hate, telling someone who has meant so much that he has to leave," Royals manager Hal McRae said hours later, when late Wednesday night had turned into early Thursday morning. "But baseball is a business, and the business is to win."

And boy, did the Royals and Reds ever show it.

In just two weeks, they've completely turned over their teams. Forget that home-brewed stuff — instant is in.

The New York Mets and California Angels haven't stood still, either. They also were big reasons why 51 players, a winter meetings record, were on the move this week. That included 14 trades, seven of them Wednesday.

On Thursday, a day after the meeting officially ended, there was a brief flurry.

Atlanta re-signed free agent Otis Nixon, guaranteeing him two years for $5.6 million and giving him the option for an additional season at another $2.5 million.

Nixon was leading the majors with 72 stolen bases when he was suspended last September for using cocaine. He missed the Braves' run to the World Series, and the penalty will carry over 18 days into next season.

Pittsburgh, which lost free agent Bobby Bonilla to the Mets, re-signed free agent Steve Buechele. The fine-fielding third baseman, who hit 22 home runs with 85 RBIs last season for Texas and the Pirates, got a four-year deal for $11 million.

Also, Toronto signed free agent pitcher Eric Plunk to a minor league contract. The pitcher the Blue Jays really want is free agent Jack Morris, and he's supposed to visit Toronto next week.

The Reds, meanwhile, rested for one day.

Since the World Series ended, the Reds have added Bip Roberts, Tim Belcher, Greg Swindell, Dave Martinez, Scott Ruskin and Bob Geren and do not have Eric Davis, Randy Myers, Jack Armstrong, Mariano Duncan and Scott Scudder. They also got John Wetteland and traded him away two weeks later.

The Royals, meanwhile, will field an entirely new team. They've added Wally Joyner, Kevin McReynolds, Gregg Jefferies, Chris Gwynn, Keith Miller and Bob Melvin, and lost Saberhagen, Todd Benzinger, Storm Davis and Bill Pecota. Almost certainly, free agent Danny Tartabull also will be lost.

"When you've finished sixth for two straight years, you do things and take certain risks that you ordinarily might not do," Royals general manager Herk Robinson said, explaining why he sent Saberhagen away.

Winter meetings wrap-up

- Fifty-one players were involved in free-agent transactions and trades.
- There were 14 trades during the meetings, including seven on Wednesday.

After disappointing finishes last season, there was no time to waste for the Angels and Mets.

The Mets, in addition to Saberhagen and Bonilla, have gotten Eddie Murray in the offseason, and have an outside shot at re-signing free agent Frank Viola. If they got him, he would join Saberhagen and Dwight Gooden as the first-ever rotation with three Cy Young winners.

"All I want to know is who's going to finish second," Baltimore executive Frank Robinson laughed, looking ahead to the NL East race. "That's all I want to know."

Angels general manager Whitey Herzog, who made his mark at the winter meetings in 1980 by dealing 22 players while with St. Louis, returned to the meetings after a two-year absence with his usual flair.

Joyner left, and Herzog gambled this week by getting Von Hayes and Hubie Brooks.

"We couldn't afford to do nothing. We finished in last place," Herzog said. "You have to have a plan and follow. You have to be a little smarter than everyone else, or at least think you are."

The Angels also wanted Nixon, but he went to Atlanta.

"He had a special feeling for both clubs for different reasons. He had played for Angels manager Buck Rodgers in Montreal," Joe Sroba, Nixon's agent, said. "We thought he was going to sign with California, but Atlanta re-thought its position and put together its package."

Buechele, up until the last minute, thought he might wind up with the New York Yankees. But at a meetings where several teams put names into a hat and shook it up, the Yankees stood absolutely still.

Aggieville crime rate normal

Volume of people in area results in more incidents but not necessarily violence

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Despite occasional incidents and the atmosphere of people drinking and letting loose that prevails in Aggieville, Riley County Police Department officers said it is generally an easygoing place.

"When you have the volume of people we have in Aggieville on a day-to-day basis, there is no other place in Manhattan like it," RCPD Capt. Nick Edvy said. "When you have the increased number of people, you will have an increased number of different behaviors, so it is reasonable to expect that there will be an increased level of activity of all sorts, not just crime."

Lt. G.R. Grubbs said, "Aggieville is a highly concentrated area. Any where you have a highly concentrated area of people the number of incidents will be higher. With a higher density of people, there will be more activity—no matter what that activity is."

Grubbs, however, said he doesn't think there is more violent activity proportionately in Aggieville compared with the rest of Manhattan.

"Obviously, alcohol does play a role in altering the behavior of the individual," Edvy said. "We don't see the same level or the same type of activity in the daytime as we do at night."

Because of Aggieville's proximity to the campus and its student orientation, Edvy said, a higher proportion of incidents involve students.

"That's not to say that we don't deal with military and townspeople as well," he said. "We have bikers in Aggieville; we have students; we have soldiers; and we have townspeople."

Assaults are the most common type of violent crime that occurs in Aggieville, Edvy said.

"People drink; they get mad at each other; they get into an argument; and one strikes the other," he said. "We have had various weapons used — anything from a gun to a pitcher of beer. By far, most of the things we deal with are done by hand or fist.

"For the size of our city, we don't have as much of a problem with the more serious violent crime that we see in some other communities," Edvy said. "Our crime rate is much lower than the national average."

On the whole, Edvy said, he feels people have little to fear when walking the streets of Aggieville.

"If you walk down the street minding your own business, assaults won't usually occur," he said. "There have been some exceptions. If I told you that never happened, I would be lying.

"There have been some cases where certain groups of young people (teen gangs) who have been frequenting Aggieville will indiscriminately pick out someone who appears to be a likely target. But those are few and far between.

"Aggieville is not a violent place," Edvy said. "It's a place where a lot of young people gather, and, occasionally, things get a little out of hand."

State-Salina Council, the students would also be able to vote in student body president elections.

College of Technology students would also be given a student activity fee menu from which they could choose to participate, with some exceptions.

Cameron Howell, second-year student in civil engineering and surveying technology, is the K-State-Salina chairman of the merger committee.

"There are some small problems that need to be worked out, like the student fees and representation," Howell said. "I feel like a lot more work will get done next semester."

Jackie McClaskey, student body president, said negotiations with K-State-Salina will continue next semester.

"The Senate Executive Committee will travel to Salina at the beginning of the spring semester to complete the merger process," McClaskey said. "The former executive committee was fully in support of the proposal and believes it is fair."

Kevin Van Meter, K-State-Salina student body president, said the transition will not be as easy as it may seem.

"The main thing is to not hurry," Van Meter said. "If time is taken to work things out thoroughly, everything will fall into place."

"She feels she'll be able to contribute Saturday, and the trainer feels that way as well," Yow said of her senior floor leader, who has been nursing an ankle sprain. "In practice today (Thursday), she did some things with us, but she kind of turned it again, and it slowed her down."

Yow said she is a bit worried that at least one WSU player will be anything but slowed down Saturday night. Manhattan native Ann Hollingsworth will start for the Shocks.

"She's likely to have one of her greatest games ever," Yow said of the freshman forward. "A hometown kid playing against K-State — she'll be excited."

Yow shares the excitement, despite the team's less-than-impressive win-loss record.

"I'm really happy with this group, attitude-wise," she said. "If we can maintain this attitude, we'll do some nice things down the road."

Women and Alcohol
an awareness effort
In addition to lowering inhibitions, drinking clouds judgment. People often make sexual decisions under the influence of alcohol that are unwise and unsafe. Unwise sex can include sexual acts which may betray a woman's commitment to herself and to the people she loves. Today, sex can also be fatal, if impulsiveness and alcohol prompt people to ignore protecting themselves physically from possible contamination by the AIDS virus.

IN FOCUS

George Peters, a 52-year-old professor of sociology and director of the Center for Aging, was diagnosed with cancer about a year ago. He had a malignant fibrous hysticytoma sarcoma, which later spread to his lungs after he had the cancer removed from his leg. He has spent extensive time at the KU Med Center and the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

Peters is trying to rehabilitate his leg muscles and improve his balance by working out at the Physical Therapy Center in Manhattan. Peters wants to get back into shape so he can challenge his master professor to a few holes of golf in the spring.

The Peters family is closer because of the challenges George Peters' battle with cancer has brought. Peters said he could not have made it through the last year without the love and care of his family, which includes his wife, Dawn (left); 9-year-old daughter, Casey (center); and 3-year-old son, Seth (right).

LIFE LESSONS

Sociology professor battling cancer finds the true value of family and friendship

George Peters, professor of sociology, first noticed the lump on his thigh last January while he was taking a shower. It wasn't painful, so he thought he somehow bumped into something.

But after a couple of weeks, the lump was still there.

"I thought it was just an injury that was going to go down," he said, "but it didn't."

When he finally saw his physician in Manhattan, he wasn't able to diagnose him. He referred Peters to a surgeon, who thought the lump was a blood clot and told Peters he would have to have surgery.

On the operating table, the surgeon shot dye into Peters' veins to take an X-ray of the lump. It was then the surgeon realized the lump was not a blood clot, but a tumor.

When the anesthesia wore off, Peters was in a car heading for the University of Kansas Medical Center.

He stayed at the KU Med Center for about a week while the physicians ran him through every possible test.

On March 8, his lump was determined to be malignant fibrous hystiocytoma sarcoma.

Nearly a year after the discovery of the cancer that has invaded Peters' body and consumed much of his time, he is able to talk about it candidly and knowledgeably.

In a steady voice, Peters explained that a sarcoma is a very rare cancer, making up only 1 percent of all cancers. It most often affects the soft tissue or smooth muscle in the extremities.

There is so little known about it, he said, that many physicians don't even recognize it, as was his case. They occur in children and adults, but in adults, it is most likely to occur in males who are about 50 years of age.

"I was right on target," he said. "It happened to me when I was 51."

Physicians use different variables to rate the severity of the cancer on a scale of one to four, with four being the most severe.

"My cancer was rated a four, which indicates a very aggressive tumor," he said.

This type of cancer grows at an extremely fast rate and likes to spread. As it spreads, microscopic cells of the cancer flake off and work into the blood stream. From there, they usually travel to the lungs.

Ten to 15 years ago, Peters said, the only treatment for this type of cancer was amputation. But since then, physicians have attempted to use chemotherapies and radiation therapies.

In Peters's case, doctors decided to use chemotherapy, which introduces toxic materials into the bloodstream. To do this, Peters had to have a catheter surgically mounted into his chest to transfer these chemicals into his body. These materials indiscriminately kill the cancer cells along with the normal body cells.

From the treatment, Peters experienced devastating side effects. He said he was nauseated all the time but never to the point of vomiting. He lost all the hair on his body, and he said he felt extremely fatigued all the time.

His treatment lasted 24 hours a day for a week. Then, his body was allowed to rest for the next two weeks before he repeated the whole ordeal.

Peters went through this treatment three times.

"The object is to keep the cancer from spreading and reduce its size so they could surgically remove it," he said. "Unfortunately, it didn't work for me."

The cancer had wrapped its tentacles around his bone and was still very large. At that point, the prognosis was to remove Peters's leg at the hip.

"It was devastating," he said. "Probably three of the worst weeks I ever spent in my life were spent trying to deal with that issue."

Finally, he said, he came to the conclusion that he didn't want to lose his leg and would get a second opinion. If the second physician had the same prognosis, he said, he would go ahead and have the leg amputated.

But just reaching this mind frame took a lot of will power and love from friends and family.

"I reasoned that, after all, I could really get along without that leg," he said. "I had convinced myself it would be all right, that I could handle it."

His physician referred him to the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, and there he was handed some good news. Amputation was not necessary. But he was placed on radiation therapy, which meant he would have to move to Rochester, Minn. There, he underwent daily treatment for six weeks.

Peters said the hardest part was being away from his wife and three children all that time.

"We were very much concerned about keeping life as normal as possible, basically for the kids," he said. "Cancer turns life upside down."

To keep the family in touch, Peters met his wife and children on weekends at a halfway point in Iowa.

Finally, in August, Peters finished the radiation therapy, and the tumor in his leg was successfully removed by surgery.

He started teaching right at the beginning of the semester, even though he was on crutches.

But in November, when he went back for a checkup, the doctors dealt him another blow. The cancer had spread to his lungs.

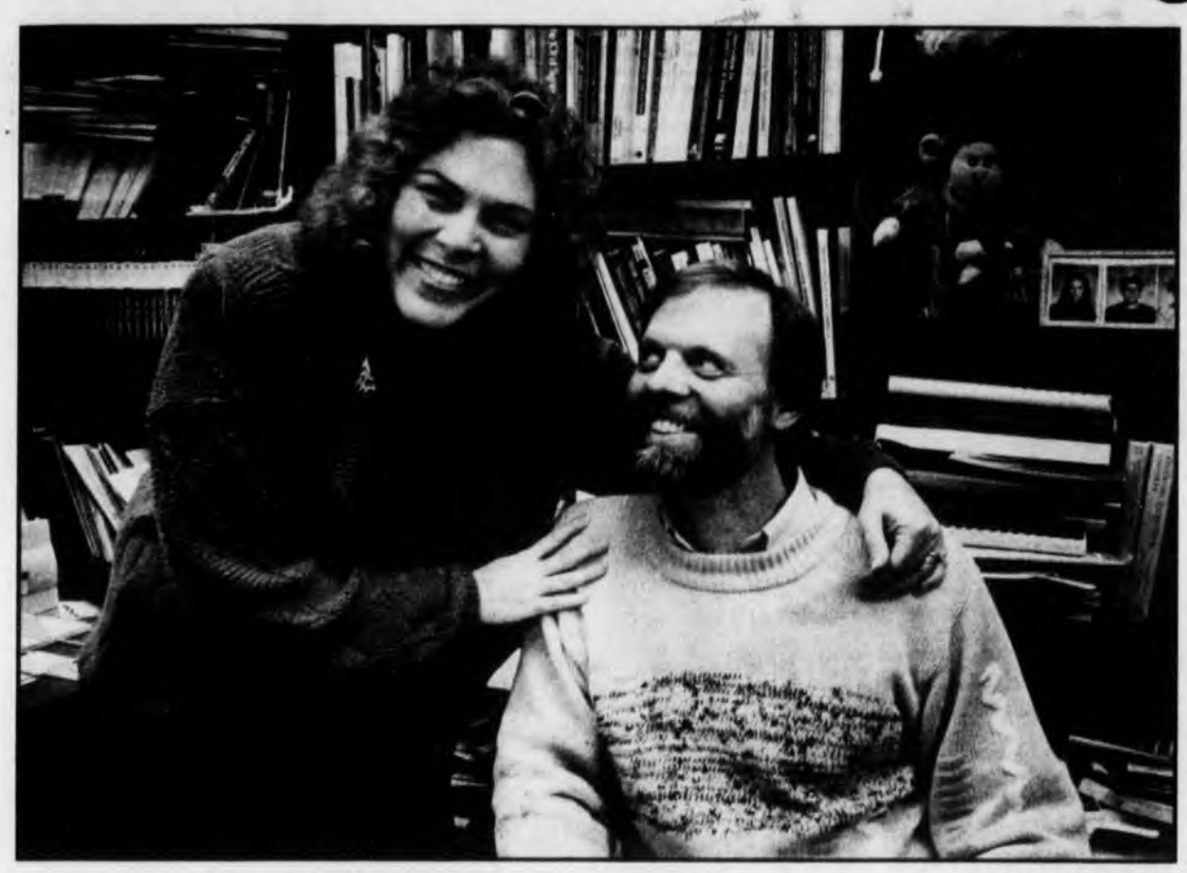
He had surgery immediately, which required his ribs to be cut in order to reach his lungs. Just the portion of the lungs around the tumors was removed, he said, but the entire procedure was excruciating.

"The first surgery was painful," he said, "but this one was unbelievable."

Peterssaid, if he is lucky, the cancer is cured now, but he has to take it a month at a time. If the cancer reappears at his next checkup, he will be a candidate for a clinical study at the Mayo Clinic.

But if the cancer does not recur, which Peters said he is determined to ensure, he will still continue to have a checkup every three months for the first couple of years. The longer he goes without a recurrence, the better his chances. But since it has already come back once, his physician has given him a 10-15-percent chance of living for five years.

"If in two years I'm clean, we'll have a party," he said. "If in five years I'm clean, we'll have a blowout."



The overwhelming support and love he has received from family, friends and colleagues has helped him deal with this trauma. Having just celebrated his 52nd birthday Saturday, he said he is determined be around for many more. In fact, he is beginning physical therapy so he can keep his bet with his master professor to play golf this summer.

"I'm a very, very lucky man. I can't think of anyone who has life any better than I do, and that is why I want to keep living. This thing may beat me, but it's never going to beat me,"

Tom Parish probably had no idea that being a lifeguard in high school would eventually lead him to a teaching position at K-State alongside his wife, Gay.

Both teach counselor education and educational psychology and are only one of several faculty couples that teach in the same department on campus.

Parish excused himself to go across the hall to wish Gay a happy anniversary.

"Our 27th is today," he beamed.

Parish and his wife met through a mutual friend when he was a lifeguard in Illinois.

"After that, I asked her on a double date," he said. "She didn't remember me but said that I had an interesting voice. After that, we became high school sweethearts."

Parish joined the Air Force after high school, and Gay attended Baker University in Baldwin — but a trip to Illinois soon changed all that.

"We got married," Parish said. "We had no money and not many hours of college credit between the two of us."

Both attended Northern Illinois State. Tom went on to get his master's in clinical psychology and eventually his doctorate in human development.

Gay did her undergraduate work at Illinois and received a bachelor's in general psychology.

Both went on to teach at Oklahoma State for the Department of Applied Behavioral Studies before coming to K-State.

Currently, the Parishes not only teach in the same department, but they also have offices right across the hall from each other.

Too close for comfort? Not at all, the Parishes said.

"I have the highest regard for my wife," Parish said, "and it's nice to be able to spend time with her."

Their years of knowledge in the field of education and psychology may just rub off on the rest of their family.

Their oldest son is studying clinical psychology, and their 18-year-old might be teaching someday. But the other three still have time to decide if they will follow their parent's footsteps.

Both agree that although they are alike, in some ways they are very different. Their teaching styles are different because they have different personalities, Parish said.

Gay Parish is currently working on her doctorate in educational psychology, which she will finish in December.

"Tom has given me a lot of support," she said.

Aruna and Barry Michie are similar to the Parishes in many ways. Both are educators, have been married for more than 20 years and work together in the same department — in the same office.

The Michies have been teaching at K-State for 16 years. Both were given temporary positions to cover for faculty members on leave.

Their third year at K-State, Aruna was offered a position in the political science department while Barry continued his temporary position in the anthropology department.

Now, a few budget cuts later, Barry's position as a temporary professor has been eliminated. He now teaches classes in political science for

"We only used the house every Sunday for Sunday school. MESI is a very worthwhile project," William Varney, the church's auditor, said. "To retain ownership of the house and make the lease bona fide and legal, we had to form the lease."

During MESI's first year, three rooms full of furniture had to be cleared out to accommodate the Sunday school classes.

Community members also help the shelter to cut its costs by donating food, appliances, clothes and money.

On the other hand, Rankin said, the best thing about the job is knowing that you're helping people to better their lives.

She said she remembers one man in particular. Before the shelter opened, Rankin said, she saw two suitcases on the porch and opened one, thinking someone had donated goods. Inside was another suitcase filled with Hardee's bags and other odds and ends.

"I closed it and left it there, because I realized it belonged to someone."

Later, a man came to the door and said he had been living under a bridge, she said. He asked for a blanket, but the shelter's supplies were all in storage, so Rankin gave him some towels instead. He returned in March.

Dinizio sees his role as 'architect' for Smithereens

Band's extended family not glamorous, but stays in style

ROD GILLESPIE
A&E Writer

Pat Dinizio, singer/songwriter for the Smithereens, doesn't mince words when he describes his role in the band.

"I'm sort of the architect and they're the builders," Dinizio says hoarsely.

"The Smithereens are really a shared vision — believe that," he quickly adds. "I just happen to be the one that has had the burden of the artistic direction thrust upon his shoulders from day one."

Dinizio is calmly fielding questions in a conference call with college journalists. His patient answers to the often repetitious questions prove he is a veteran of media show-and-tell.

"It's an extended family and a brotherhood," he continues. "Obviously there's a lot of love and respect involved, especially since we've been together nearly 12 years now. The relationships for the other three members of the band pre-dated the formation of the band by at least 15 years — they went to grade school together, graduated high school together, learned to play their instruments in a garage together."

"We're not anyone's idea of a glamour band and we're certainly not the flavor of the week," he adds. "I think we've survived, because we've never particularly been in style — so consequently we're not going to go out of style, if you know what I mean."

Dinizio doesn't use the conference call to hype "Blow Up," the band's most recent release. In fact, Dinizio isn't exactly proud of the album.

"Quite honestly, I'm not completely happy with several of the cuts on the record," he says. "If I could do it again I would have left several of the cuts off — I won't say which ones specifically — and I would have liked to remix several things."

Apparently, this architect is a perfectionist.

"I wish I had a few more weeks to live with the final recording," Dinizio says. "Anyone who's completely happy with what they put out has a problem. You should always keep trying for more."

And he admits to being baffled by the album's lukewarm reception after the success of 1990's "11."

"The first single didn't do what we thought it would do," Dinizio says quietly. "There was a negative response to it, and I thought it was a fine song. We can only try our best with these things. Sometimes it's a reflection of the economy, of how music is changing, a lot of different things. What we're doing may not be out of time for the time being. I have no way of knowing."

The album's slow sales haven't hurt the band's live performances, though.

"We reinvent the set list week to week and take requests from the audience," Dinizio says. "We don't do the same set the same way every night. That way it keeps it fresh for us. We're doing a real eclectic blend of material. It's sort of a retrospective representation of the 12 years we've been together making music."

Don't look for the Smithereens to do offbeat versions of their songs live, Dinizio says.

"There's nothing that disappoints me more than when I go to a concert and I see an artist who's bored with his own material and will do a reggae version of a song that was meant to be a hard rock song," he says. "I think it's an insult or a slap in the face to the audience who loves the artist's work and who's paying their hard-earned money to see the material performed a specific certain way."

The Smithereens, a band that has done Beatles and R.E.M. covers live, may have some surprises in store for fans on an upcoming album.

"We're hoping that in between 'Blow Up' and the next studio record that we can put out a CD compilation of about 25 tunes that no one has heard," Dinizio says. "There's tons of material in the vaults."

Tons-o-fun we've had, to think it's one-half over makes me sad., This personal is drawing to a close, when you're done, please don't hit me in the nose. Gosh, Golly, what else can I say... I wish you both a Happy Holiday! The wanna be.

ROSEY- YOU'RE graduating! Graduating?! No! Who am I going to party with? Who's gonna keep me outta trouble? I'll miss you. Good luck. Love, your dot, Julie.

SCOTTIE DOG- It's taken a while but you've made it. Thanks for including me in the days of wine and roses. All my love, Sweet Kitty.

SUPER CHUCK- or should I say Mr. Schmuck! This first year with you has gone by so fast! I have especially enjoyed our "lucky streaks" aand those mud puddles. Love you sweetheart!- Kris #4. P.S.- Thanks Sara!

SUZANNE: HAPPY Birthday early. Kick butt during finals week.- Somebody.

TAU BETA Sigma Monica- Tonight's the night for you to find out who your dad is. Here's one last clue- Yours is music, mine is electrical, See you tonight! Love, Dad.

TO AUSTIN'S new mommy and daddy. Congrats, you are both great parents, LW & JW. By the way, best wishes on a happy new future here, there or wherever. Love and happy tears, Pat H.

TO THE first graduate of "The Ladies of LeGore" what can we say? Except... Bar senior likes to drive east in a west bound lane to play games at Longhorns with men of judging skills. While there she determines with Bar junior the difference between a blimp and a baler and they ultimately decide it's best not to dance with strangers. Congratulations and thanks for the memories. Your roomies for life, Jax, Lisa, Vick, and Mila.

TURTLE, AND to think most people say jeeps are just for 4- wheeling. Six more days till presents, paradise, and hash-browns via room service. You are truly one-in-a million, Sacrifice.

K-State at Fort Riley.

But that hasn't changed the fact that they still drive to work together, have lunch together and after 16 years at K-State, finally share the same office.

"We have no problem working together," Michie said. "We shared an office together in graduate school, so we are used to it."

He said people sometimes question how they can spend so much time together.

"I tell them that we have no problem," he said.

The Michies have also done their share of traveling over the years. Their 23-year-old romance began in India while they were volunteers for the Peace Corps.

After they were married, they started graduate school together at Michigan State. K-State was the next step.

"It was the only place that had two positions open," Michie said. "Even if they were only temporary."

The Michies both work together to help students. They also work on the same issues and questions dealing with rural society, Michie said.

"One could say that we have a great complementary interests," he said.

Another couple with the same complementary interests is Mary and Robert Zabels, who both teach in the special education department.

The Zabels are essentially mirror images of each other. Both have a specialty in behavioral disorders, were former elementary school teachers, worked on their doctorate degrees together and do research projects together.

Their teaching styles, however, are different. One might compare them to a record.

"A student once told me that I teach at 78 rpms, whereas my husband teaches at 33 rpms," Mary Zabels said.

"I can't imagine doing it any other way," she said.

Having valuables registered with the police department and having valuables engraved with serial numbers can help in location if the items do get stolen, Conkwright said.

Lt. Richard Howard of the K-State Police Department said the only instances of break-ins that are usually frequent during breaks in school are in off-campus houses.

"Fraternity and sorority houses are most often broken into over the breaks, because they are easy targets," Howard said.

"We have found these houses have faulty locks on doors and windows that lead to break-ins," Howard said. "If someone could stay in these houses, it would be better."

Howard said the number of officers on duty will not increase over the break, but the number of physical checks of doors, windows and locks will be made more frequently to campus buildings and off-campus housing.

statements, goal and aspiration statements and a review and recommendations concerning all academic programs."

The regents will receive the document at their December meeting next Thursday and then act on it at their January meeting.

The board also will receive individual mission statements of the University of Kansas, K-State, Wichita State, Pittsburg State, Emporia State and Fort Hays State at its February meeting and act on them at its March meeting.

A preamble to the "Strategy for Mission Development," as the plan is titled, says:

"The ability of a state to fulfill the vision of its future — to transform its aspirations into achievements — is in large part built upon the effectiveness and reputation of its system of higher education.

Rep. William Ford, D-Mich., and House Education and Labor Committee chairman, in floor debate said the requirement for a credit check is the end of loans to many low-income people in this country.

"The program was started for people who could not walk into a bank with a cosigner and borrow money. This turns around 26 years of commitment to the people of this country to give people access to education."

Baird-Olson said there is an assumption in this country that people have poor financial credit because they are lazy.

"Most people don't default on loans because they are irresponsible, but because their financial situation causes it," she said.

"If this is a way to get rid of those few who don't pay off their loans, this is a lousy way to do it," Baird-Olson said.

"I am not saying that student loan defaults should not be repaid," Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., said. "However, senators should understand that this will not be painless revenue we are going after. The student loan defaulters are for the most part not the country club doctors, but rather unwed mothers trying to raise a family on a minimum wage job.

"Garnishment, rightly or wrongly, is going to impose severe hardships on these people."

In a letter to Capitol Hill, NASFAA President Dallas Martin said, "We strongly oppose the imposition of credit checks on federal student loan borrowers who are 21 years of age or older, and the requirement that students pay the cost of these credit checks.

"While NASFAA recognizes that the cost of this new unemployment compensation must be offset pursuant to the Budget Enforcement Act of 1990, we are troubled that America's students are going to be the ones who ultimately pay for it."

Donna Laraway, freshman in sociology, is a non-traditional student and will be affected by the bill.

"What everybody has to realize is that this is going to affect all students," Laraway said. "This law shows that we are becoming an elitist society, but school is not only for the wealthy."

Laraway said the law will go before the Senate again for final stipulations and guidelines, and it will become effective in January for the 1992-93 school year.

The amendment that Neaderhiser proposed would call for objecting to consider an amendment.

"This will be a time-saving device. If we had it in effect last year, it only would've kept us from hearing what we didn't pass anyway," he said.

Speaking in opposition to the amendment was Tricia Thornton, arts and sciences senator.

"This would create chaos and would confuse the issue," she said. "It would take away from the issue we're debating to debate what we're debating. We're being asked to flip a coin for or against something."

Arts and Sciences Sen. Ian Bautista said, "Say, for example, that I'm like Don Quixote. Sometimes battling windmills is a good idea. I might have an amendment that would be good, but it would never get heard just because people would think that I've had off-the-wall amendments in the past. Senate meetings don't get out this early all the time, so saving time isn't the issue."

STUDY BREAK

Monday, December 16, 1991 | Kansas State University, Manhattan, Kansas 66506 | SPECIAL EDITION

SCOTT BOYD/Illustration

Seeing campus in a different light

BY KELLY BERG AND CAMBI COLLEY

Editor's note: Kelly Berg, senior in journalism and mass communications, and Cambi Colley, senior in journalism and mass communications, spent a day last week physically disabled. Kelly blinded herself by placing bandages over her eyes, and Cambi spent the day in a wheelchair. This is their story.

KELLY

The last thing I saw that day was my reflection in the mirror as I placed the adhesive patches over my eyes. It was 8:15 a.m. As I groped around in the blackness for Cambi's wheelchair, I began to wonder about the feasibility of this experiment. Could a blind person really lead a paraplegic safely around campus?

I found her chair only inches away, and with a death grip that would impress Arnold Schwarzenegger, I attached myself to the back with no intention of letting go at any point in the day.

CAMBI

The wheelchair was waiting. I walked over and plopped into what would become my home for the next 10 hours as Kelly blindly worked her way toward me. It occurred to me that while the simple act of getting out of bed in time for class was usually a huge obstacle, it was going to pale in comparison to a paraplegic leading a blind person around campus.

KELLY

Cambi's first attempts at maneuvering the wheelchair were pretty humorous. But after several giggling episodes, we finally managed to get the wheelchair rolling in a semi-steady pattern with me pushing and Cambi barking out orders: "A little to the left! No, that's too much. Now right. Okay, keep going that way. No, wait. Left, but just a little." It was in that manner we finally got out of King Hall (our starting point) and awkwardly moved ourselves out into the fresh air.

CAMBI

As we left King Hall, one of the few fully handicapped-accessible buildings on campus, the wheelchair seemed to have a mind of its own. It repeatedly veered toward the left. I must have sounded like an Army sergeant calling out directions to Kelly in attempts to keep us on track.

KELLY

After what seemed like an elaborate amount of twists, turns and changes of direction, Cambi informed me we were about to cross the street. I was already disoriented and had no idea what direction we were headed. I felt a flood of panic as I realized I had no idea where we were — we'd only gone a few yards, and I might as well have been on a totally foreign campus. Cambi said to turn left, so I did.

CAMBI

I maneuvered the wheelchair around a lamp post in an attempt to get out of the way of students who had just gotten out of their 8:30 classes. They walked toward me with quick steps and determined looks on their faces. Determined to get to class, determined to get home and eat lunch, determined not to stare too long at the girl in the wheelchair and her blind comrade clinging to the handles for guidance.

KELLY

When Cambi was quiet, I had nothing except the security of holding on FINALS. UGH.

The Collegian staff has put together this special Study Break issue to give you an escape from studying. Inside, you will find poetry, short fiction and essays, two pages of crosswords, cryptoquips and cartoons for those times this week when it feels like the books and notes in front of you are going to make your eyes bleed. And, if finals don't go well, take it from most of the Collegian staff – there's always next semester. Good luck with your finals.

When I was a little kid, my dad had an imaginary friend.

We had a horse at our house.

I never really saw the horse. He hid under the couch by day — too many kids — and slept under the coffee table at night.

The horse was always the one who forgot to wipe off the counter when he ate or he ate the last Twinkie in the box and left the empty box in the cupboard. He also drank the milk straight from the carton and left the lid off the water jug in the refrigerator. You know what I mean.

After I grew up considerably, I kind of forgot the horse.

When I was 33, my father became very ill. He had surgery for lung cancer, and we almost lost him. After that, it was a year of chemotherapy, radiation treatments, and then there was that time when he broke his hip. Oh, they replaced the hip, but his legs never seemed to recuperate.

Eventually, he went to Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn. There, they diagnosed him as having Eaton-Lambert Syndrome, a rare side-effect of cancer. Well, he had survived the cancer itself, chemo, radiation and hip replacement surgery. But that damned stuff was debilitating, and his legs will never be the same.

You win some, you lose some.

Finally, after all was said and done, he passed his five-year survival mark. Hell, he passed his six-year survival mark, with a mere 4-percent survival rate. I'm impressed.

So, this one day, we're sitting there, and I looked at him and said, "Say, Dad, whatever happened to that horse you had around the house when us kids were growing up? You remember, the one who always got us kids in trouble."

"Oh, he's still around."

"He is? Well, does he still sleep under the coffee table?"

"Nope, he lives in the basement."

"Does he ever come upstairs?"

"Not too often," he answered with a twinkle in his eyes. "His legs went bad, too."

POETRY

The nativity

It was a lowly stable
A place to keep cattle
Smelly and dirty
All in all, pretty shabby
The animals ate hay
Went about their usual way

They were poor shepherds
Watching over their herds
Over a few sheep
Did their watch keep
On a starry night
With no one in sight

But one evening
In this stable
So dirty and shabby
Was born a Baby
Who made a bed of straw His cradle
Who made His home with the cattle who became a King

But that one, quiet evening
As the shepherds lay sleeping
They saw a sight
That made them shake with fright
Then angels appeared out of the sky so blue
Who said that a King had been born for me and you
Then the shepherds heard singing
A song of great rejoicing
So the shepherds left right away
And found the Child as the angels did say

Christ has been born
This very morn
Even though He came as least
He is the Prince of Peace

How to pull an all-nighter

First, admit that it's what you'll do.
Resign, and then forgive yourself.
Everything's easier after this.

You will need an extra meal, of course,
so plan it — both the menu and the time — and work toward it, having it by yourself when you finally do.

Drink water more often than not and don't flush until the sun comes up.

Talk to yourself aloud and a lot, mixing praise with opprobrium —
both are useful in moderation.
Masturbate often if it helps you think.

A shower can be a mini reward,
but don't fool yourself:
only you will stink less afterward.
And your work may suffer by comparison.

Kill the clock; hide the pieces.
Promise to start earlier next time.

By Taylor Mali, graduate student in English.

Drive

Night
descended upon the whining, creaking old car enveloping it with its own eerie silence.

Stars spread across the moonless sky, insignificant, twinkling dots running forever toward an unknown goal reflecting off snow covered trees of another cosmos.

Cold
eminated from every direction forcing itself into the driver
as he continued on his winding escape course through the thrusting mountains.

Thoughts danced and intertwined with reality as numbness creeped into his fingers and toes.

His skin pales blue while his blood freezes as he continues to drive from life.

Calcuwock

'Twas limit, and the square root of x
Did graph and evaluate on the x and y-axes;
All minimum were the extreme values,
And the Chain rule outdated.

"Beware the Calcuwock my son!
The derivatives that bite, the integrals that catch!
Beware the sine of x, and shun
The limit as x approaches infinity!"

He took his vorpal pencil in hand:
Long time the maximum point he sought —
So rested he by the Algebra tree,
And stood awhile in thought.

And as in non-math thought he stood,
The Calcuwock with eyes of exponents,
Came geometrically through the trigly
wood,
And integrated as it came!

One, Two! One, Two! And through and through
The vorpal pencil went add and subtract!
He left it dead and with its head
He went computing back.

"And hast thou slain the calcuwock?
Come to my arms, my clever boy!
O fraction day! Callooh! Callay!"
He chortled in his joy.

'Twas limit and the square root of x
Did graph and evaluate on the x and
y-axes;
All minimum were the extreme values,
And the Chain Rule outdated.

Nevermore

When I feel depressed, and lack the want
To rise from it, to be alive,
I start to slip from reality
To my own place in the stars.

To the place where wishes, dreams
And all the things we want to be,
Are but there for us to grab,
For us to have, for us to be!

It is here that I made, that I still make,
The different masks I use to hide.
The masks that keep inside the pain,
That makes me want not to survive.

And at these times when I'm adrift
In the place that has no name,
I find that my desire to return,
Is slowly, softly, floating away.

For here it is that I can have,
Here it is that I can be,
All that reality denies,
And all that reality takes from me.

Yet just when I am about to lose,
About to cut all my ties from reality,
My mind begins to remind me,
To tell what reality hath given me.

It tells me of friends who care,
Who want to help me through my despair,
If I will only let them in, let them come,
To the place that is no more.

And so my turmoil begins again,
Do I go where my life ends?
Or do I let those who care for me,
Let those who love me come in the door?

Finally, the decision made,
I return from the place without a name,
Return to the place I was before,
That I had hoped to see, nevermore.

When I emerge, I am startled to find,
That my friends were with me all the time,
'Twas not them who left me in my despair,
'Twas I who left, to torture myself there.

And so my friends only now do I see,
How much you truly mean to me.
Without you all, I might instead,
Have stayed inside that place in my head.

And now the place that is no more,
That has no name upon its door,
Shall here be called forevermore,
Shall have the name of Nevermore.

The beauty and joy of the snow

The beauty of the falling snows
Flakes so small, so little
So delicate, so brittle
Falling so pretty
Feeling so softly
As they brush against your nose

The beauty of the deep snow
Covering the earth like a white blanket
And when you step into it
It feels like marshmallow
And the crunch of the snow
As you go making tracks that sound like Cracker Jack

The joy of the snow
As the little ones know
Is having school closed
Time to get a sled
And go down the hill
And maybe take a spill
Or making a snowman
If they can
Getting into a snowball fight
To kids, snow's all right

The joy of the snow
Skiers swishing down the mount
Hoping they don't go down for the count
Or going cross country
Enjoying the snow's beauty
Going for a sleigh ride
Hearing the sleigh glide
And after being in the snow
Having a drink of hot cocoa

Snow is a thing of beauty
It is very pretty
Snow can bring on a happy glow
So, come on, let it snow

Rachel Swan, Fran Swan, Terry Marker
Dr. E. Hamrick Swan, Jr.

My name is Rick Swan. I've wanted to be a dentist since I was a sophomore at Venice High School in Florida. My dad was a career Army man.

I attended Florida State University for my undergraduate training and based on an early three year acceptance went to University of Louisville, School of Dentistry. We were to be the first class to go all four years of dental school in their new medical-dental complex completed before September, 1970.

While at Louisville, I received an Armed Forces scholarship for the last two years of my dental education. In order to pay back my scholarship, I was assigned to active duty in the dental corps at Fort Riley and moved my family to Manhattan in June of 1974. While active duty at Fort Riley, I rotated through the oral surgery clinic, endodontics, prosthodontics, and at Irwin Army Hospital. Having gained a lot of practical experience, I helped Dr. Jay Hildreth at his Alma, Kansas, practice in 1975 and his Wamego practice in 1980.

I decided to stay in the Manhattan area. It is a great place to raise a family.

In 1978, I bought an exciting practice in Marysville, Kansas, 60 miles north of Manhattan.

The last six of my children were born in Manhattan, the first two were born in Louisville, where I was in dental school. My family has always doctored and gone to church in the Manhattan area. Jared, upon graduation from Manhattan High School attended K-State and is now on a church mission to the spanish speaking people in Sacramento, California and Rachel is a freshman at K-State.

I will now be offering two locations to my patients; one in Marysville and one in Manhattan.

The staff members of the Manhattan practice are very caring and people oriented and very well trained. Terry Marker (wife of Doug Marker construction) has been with Dr. Charles Morton over six years and prior to that worked for Dr. Christensen in Colorado. Rachel Swan is my daughter and a K-State freshman previously employed by Amigo's in Aggieville as assistant public relation's and co-worker. Fran Swan is my wife and was public relation's manager for Amigo's Restaurant in Aggieville and in the Manhattan Town Center for two years and has worked with the Aggieville business association. She has also worked as my office manager and assistant for the past year and a half.

I enjoy doing dentistry, working with children and adults in providing for them better oral health, helping someone who is in pain. Making smiles more attractive is a great reward.

I would consider it an honor and privilege to help you and your family in any of your dental needs. If you or your family are looking for a dentist or are loosing your dentist, please give us a try. I am sure we can be of service to you.

We are located at 1121 Waters Dr. across from Aleo, behind Ed Schram Dodge and Blooming Dale's. New patients are welcome, call 537-9785. We are here Monday through Saturday & evening hours are available. Watch for our coupon display in Dillons Westloop with major name brand dental related coupons. We are a Blue Cross/Blue Shield & Delta Dental providers.

Sincerely,
Dr. Swan & Staff

An interesting Christmas with Grandpa Bruce

SHAWN BRUCE

Grandpa Bruce always made Christmas interesting.

Notice, I didn't use the word 'fun.' Sometimes, Christmas with Grandpa was anything but that — especially in his later years, when he started calling me "Gary" for some inexplicable reason.

And, oh, the stories. Grandpa had spent two or three years working on oil pipelines in Alaska and the rest of his life telling stories about it. I probably know the terrain of the Alaskan interior better then some natives.

Grandpa Bruce didn't bake, either. He fried. While other kids told stories of chocolate chip cookies and roast turkey, I told stories of hamburgers that were charcoal black on the outside and blood red on the inside.

Mom and Dad blamed it on the fact that Grandpa insisted on cooking everything on the highest heat the stove would allow. I blamed it on the bacon grease he insisted cooking the hamburgers in.

But, despite his slightly injured powers of recollection, deep in his heart (past the cholesterol filled arteries), Grandpa Bruce was a man who loved the Christmas season.

Grandpa would carefully catalog all the Christmas cards he received and make sure all his visitors got to see them. He had a small artificial Christmas tree that would stay up way past the end of Christmas-tree season because he "hadn't got around to putting it away yet."

One Christmas, Grandpa Bruce presented my sister with seven carefully wrapped packages. My sister opened the first one and said, "Gee, Grandpa , thanks. It's a watch."

To make a long story short, my sister unwrapped seven watches that night. Each time she opened one, it got harder for her to act surprised. While the rest of us tried to control our laughter, Grandpa sat in the corner and beamed.

"She's got a watch for every day of the week now," Grandpa said, and the rest of us had to agree. And even if four of the watches didn't work, and the other three were ugly as sin, it's the thought that counted.

Alas, as much as Grandpa loved Christmas, there was one thing he loved even more. That was The Nashville Network, the cable channel that concentrates on country music.

Unfortunately, my family doesn't have cable television. And because of that, one Christmas, Grandpa got mad as hell.

It had started off innocently enough. Dad went into town about 6 o'clock to get Grandpa and bring him to our house. After a nice dinner, we opened presents and retired to the living room.

Grandpa then spoke.

"Hey," he said. "Turn the television to TNN. There's a Christmas special I want to see."

Mom kindly explained that we didn't get TNN. Grandpa proceeded to grow angry.

Suffice it to say, Dad ended up taking Grandpa home early that night so he could see the Christmas special. I never asked Grandpa if he enjoyed it, but I'm pretty sure he did (especially if there were song-and-dance numbers).

Grandpa died on April Fool's Day 1989. We never did spend a Christmas where everyone gathered around the piano and sang songs. We never strung a tree with popcorn together. And as for hugs, forget it. Grandpa Bruce didn't go for that "mushy stuff."

But that's OK. Every time I think of Grandpa saying, "What the hell do you mean, you don't get TNN?" tears come to my eyes, and a smile comes to my face.

And that, my friends, is what Christmas is all about.

Time again to venture to winter wonderland

Skate skiing new, popular outdoor snow sport

CARY HASSELL
Collegian Reporter

Each ski season that passes, another new sport, a cousin to skiing, grabs the interest of outdoor winter enthusiasts.

Skate skiing, similar to cross country and telemark skiing, is one of the newest and up-and-coming forms of gliding through the snow. More and more people are taking up skiing's newest incarnation.

The reasons for skating's increasing popularity are myriad, according to Gene Dayton, who, along with his wife, Therese, owns the Breckenridge and Whatley Nordic Centers.

"Though the numbers of skaters has increased dramatically over the past few years," Dayton said, "that has not come at the expense of classical skiing. We're seeing a lot of classical skiers who are taking up skating as well, and we're seeing a lot of alpine skiers and bicyclists who are taking up nordic skiing for the health benefits."

According to Dayton, skate skiing was actually "invented" in the early 1980s.

Dayton said skate skiing is more similar to other forms of skiing than people think.

"There is a natural crossover from alpine skiing because both skating and alpine skiing use the edges a lot. And there's a cross from bicycling because a lot of the same muscle groups are used."

Louis Tansil, rental shop manager for Antlers Ski Shop, said a person can spend between $100 and $350 for new skating skis.

Tansil said poles cost between $30 and $200.

Coloradans look for good ski season

CARY HASSELL
Collegian Reporter

It may be rude to say, but Colorado has been dumped on, and all the ski towns are singing praises of thanks to the goddess of snow.

Avid fans of winter sports, it's time to dig out those skis, snowboards and toboggans, because the snow in Colorado just doesn't seem to stop.

Although the recession has affected most of the United States, Summit County does not seem to be hurt.

Lou Wagner, resident of Frisco, Colo., and president of Wagner Associates, said Frisco and other Summit County ski towns are looking forward to one of their best seasons.

"The word recession isn't heard very much around here," Wagner said. "People in other states are waiting for the recession to end. We're waiting for the recession to begin."

Summit County first came to the attention of the outside world around 1859 when prospectors discovered there was, indeed, gold there and silver, too.

In 1946, a group of postwar ski enthusiasts inaugurated Arapahoe Basin Ski Area, and Summit County discovered a new bonanza — snow.

With the opening of Breckenridge Ski Area in 1960, Keystone in 1971 and Copper Mountain in 1972, The Summit became one of the world's premier ski resorts.

In 1980, Summit County retail sales surpassed $100 million. In 1990, Summit County retail sales reached $400 million, and Ski the Summit broke the record of hosting three million skiers in the 1990 ski season alone.

Another advantage to this year's ski season is that most of the mountains were opening lifts at the end of October.

David Watson, resident of Frisco, Colo., and manager of Mountain Mocha, said the early mountain openings give locals the chance to hit the slopes before most of the tourists arrive.

"It's great to be able to ski some before the thousands of tourists arrive," Watson said. "Right now, we're just seeing a lot of Denver residents coming up for the weekend."

Riding the blue unicorn

BY G.H. WILLIAM III

We came screaming into the hot, Saturday afternoon, riding the blue unicorn. The air seemed to press down on everyone, holding them still until night.

Julian and I had dropped at 3 p.m., and by 4:30, we could feel the beginnings of an incredible surge of power. We were the only ones not paralyzed by the heat.

The people we flew by stared at us in terror, seeing within us the demonic power we had unleashed in ourselves. Our entire being was focused in our stares, and the poor drones who were forever locked to the hot afternoon could not survive long under our gaze.

Julian peddled harder, and I followed, racing the setting sun across town, past the solid stone and glittering glass of the University, into an Aggieville that was slowly waking up from its hot sleep.

The ponderous hands of my watch clicked onward with ominous sluggishness, finally passing 8. The sun had come to rest below the western trees, and the sky faded into a neon nightmare.

People slowly came unstuck from the heat around us and began moving in their own circles, in search of their own earthly pleasures. The music tumbling out of Last Chance sprang away from the bar with a life of its own, bouncing from building to building.

Julian abandoned me, biking off toward campus, following an angel I hadn't seen. He sped away from me with rapture in his face and fire in his eyes. "In-freaking-vincible," he yelled back to me. "I'm in-freaking-vincible."

The power was sweeping me onward, and it was useless to resist. I floated like acid fog through Aggieville, tossing aside my enemies with the force of my gaze.

The power had built to white-hot intensity, and it was unleashed through my eyes. Wherever I looked, things burst into day-glo fire. Trees withered and died, buildings melted, people fried in their own juices before me.

Bad rap music pulsed from the cars that shoved their way through the crowded Saturday night in predator mode. Military and frat guys alike strutted from bar to bar, wearing their masculinity like a cheap jacket. None could touch me.

By the time I made it to the parking lot where I made my last stand, the wave I was riding was so intense that I was worried I might fall off and be crushed beneath it. Casting my gaze about, setting everything ablaze with my heat vision, I searched for a focus.

My eye caught her heel and rode up her leg, her back, to her golden hair. She turned and met my gaze. All the fire streaming from me was reflected back thousand-fold by her violet eyes. My soul felt like it was being stretched apart in agonizing slow-motion. We stared at each other as the sounds of car horns and shouting drunks blended into an almost unbearably beautiful symphony. A beat later, she smiled.

As the wave of relieved cool rushed through me, her boyfriend appeared like a thunderstorm from behind her. "What's your problem, you freak?"

Muscles like basketballs, cro-magnon forehead, a nose mashed flat across his slab of a face, and he was calling me a freak. I just giggled.

"What are you laughing at, wimp?" He shoved me, and the world tilted. I laughed harder. She smiled at me.

His fist came like a battering ram into my stomach. Laughing like a possessed hyena, I launched myself up at his face, which seemed to be miles above me. My fists crashed furiously against his face, again and again.

He seemed to recede in slow motion, surprised by my ferociousness. The power coursed through me, and I laughed harder. His hand curled into a fist, and swung back, a piston about to fire. Thunder rippled along his arm.

The power shot from my gut, searing through my spine to my face. My power, my chin, his fist, all met in an explosion of sound, light and fury.

The cloud of light faded, and I was on the ground, face to the asphalt, giggling hysterically. "Stop laughing," the thunder god said. "Stop laughing!" His leg hammered into me, his foot ripped through my torso. I laughed.

"IN-FREAKING-VINCIBLE," I yelled and laughed up at him. He kicked me again. I laughed and laughed. He spat down at me, glared and walked off.

She followed him into the dark. Before she vanished, she turned to me one last time and smiled sadly down at me. I forced my broken mouth into a smile and giggled. She joined the shadows and was gone.

I couldn't stop laughing. I had won. He had pummeled me into the parking lot, and I had won. I lay there laughing, spitting blood and teeth onto the hot asphalt, in-freaking-vincible. Like Julian had said, "In-freaking-vincible."

I gathered up my sore body and rode home. I rode my pain, I rode my laughter. I rode the blue unicorn on home.

to her chair. It wasn't enough. It didn't take me long to start resenting silence. My only connection to her and the rest of the campus was sound, so I kept her talking.

"Where are we now? Are there a lot of people? Is anyone staring?"

CAMBI

The stares were interesting. I noticed that passers-by looked for a short time, but they always looked away at the squirrels or something when I gazed up at them. I wished Kelly could see the reactions we were getting. It was strange, but I actually felt guilty about taking up so much room on the sidewalk. I felt like apologizing profusely to every frat boy I ran off into the grass.

"Did every wheelchair-bound person feel this way?" I wondered.

KELLY

Her answers seemed incomplete — vague. "A girl" told me nothing. What did she look like? "Straight ahead" was a worthless command. What was straight?

"Right over there," she said.

"What!?" I couldn't control the frustration. "Could you PLEASE be a little more specific?"

CAMBI

I realized that one of our biggest problems would be communication when I instructed Kelly to "go straight," and she said, "How am I supposed to know what straight is?" I sensed some frustration in her voice as we rolled and shuffled our way into the sunlight.

KELLY

Where were we now? The campus had never seemed so large. Suddenly Nichols Hall seemed as distant as a foreign country. Getting to Throckmorton Hall seemed like an impossible task. We only had 40 minutes till our first class. It was in Eisenhower Hall.

CAMBI

It didn't take too long to come to the realization that we weren't going to make it to all our classes that day. Sitting at the bottom of three flights of stairs in Eisenhower and hoping someone would come along and carry me up just wasn't feasible.

We got there in plenty of time. The special handicap-friendly door was our passage into the building, but what next? There was no way off the first floor, and our class was on the third. I hoped our teacher would understand. On to class No. 2.

So we moved on to the next class which was, of all places, the Old Stadium. Ugh!

KELLY

While Cambi seemed to be getting more proficient at maneuvering the wheelchair, I was feeling more and more handicapped; more and more dependent; and more and more frustrated at it all.

CAMBI

I could tell she was getting more disoriented and tired of being blind. I, on the other hand, was finding it easier to maneuver the wheelchair and more upset about the lack of accessibility to the buildings.

KELLY

"Where are we now, Cambi? Which route are we taking?"

CAMBI

By this time, my blind follower was completely disoriented and was asking questions every couple of feet. I knew I should've been more compassionate to her dilemma, but damn it, I had my own. Like how we were going to cross the "impossible curb." I had no idea a mere curb could be so scary. But this one didn't have an opening to get down off of for miles. When I finally found a break, I wheeled too fast, and there we were, in the middle of the K-State Union parking lot. I was waiting for her to question again where we were.

KELLY

I heard cars everywhere. My grip tightened. We must be going down hill; she's going so fast. I can't lose my grip. No one can tell I'm blind with these sunglasses on, they'd probably hit me. I'm scared to death, and I'm only in a parking lot. I'm embarrassed. "Where are we?"

CAMBI

I calmly told her we were surrounded by crazed students recklessly racing their cars toward open parking spots. I told her to hold on, that I would get us out of this. Far be it from me to get us both killed in the middle of our experiment.

KELLY

Suddenly the chair stopped and tipped to one side. No warning. I bashed into the back of the chair. God, what happened?

CAMBI

I was still dictating directions to Kelly: "To the left. No, not that much!"

It was too late. The wheel had slipped off the edge of the sidewalk, and we were stuck. I knew she couldn't lift up the wheelchair, so there we sat until help came along. Students by the dozen passed us up. It was an elderly couple who finally came to our rescue.

KELLY

The voice said, "Hey there, you look like you're having trouble." He talked to Cambi. Does he know I'm blind? I feel the need for him to know. I blurt out, "I'm blind," as if it explained everything. I feel stupid, because I don't know if he's looking at me. Is he wanting me to say something? Where is he? What is he doing? I had to let go of the chair, panic overwhelms me.

"Cambi? Where are you? I can't find you." I'm disgusted by the fear in my voice.

CAMBI

"Hey there, you look like you're having trouble," the short white-haired man said. His wife had matching white hair and was wearing jeans. I was amazed at the calmness of his voice and the understanding smiles both of them gave. With all his 70-year-old strength, he lifted my wheelchair back up on the sidewalk. I thanked them, Kelly groped at them, and we were on our way.

KELLY

It took hours to cross the parking lot, but a familiar voice greeted us on the other side. I knew the voice. It was my friend Phil. Phil and Cambi talked. I held on to the chair. Phil helped direct us to the best way to get to the Purple Masque Theatre (the only way for a person in a wheelchair). I felt a sudden coolness, almost as if we were in a tunnel. I could hear doors opening and closing. They weren't talking to me. They weren't telling me what they were doing. I felt a sudden burst of anger. "Could you guys please tell me what you're doing? I'm blind, remember?"

CAMBI

We arrived at the doorway to the Old Stadium and again met with an impossible hurdle. Three steps. We took a detour of what seemed to be the whole way around the stadium. As we moved past the police station and down the corridor leading to the Purple Masque, I saw someone walking beside us out of the corner of my eye. It was a friend of Kelly's who had helped us get started that morning. I had never been so glad to see anyone. He helped us get into the building and to the theater class. Then he was gone. I was amazed at how the slightest offer of help could seem so important. Each time someone opened a door for us, I could've kissed him or her.

KELLY

I'd been meeting with this theater class in this room for more than four months. But today, the whining pipes were driving me crazy. I'd heard the pipes whine and clank before today, but once class had started, there were usually other things that took my mind off it, and the noise was soon forgotten. Not today. Today all I had was sound. And that particular sound was dominating. It seemed so loud, so distracting. I noticed the noise sounded similar to a computer printer at work. I pointed it out to the rest of the class. Then they all heard it. Once it was brought to their attentions, it drove them crazy, too. The instructor dismissed class early because it was too distracting.

CAMBI

Next came our big challenge — lunch at the Union. It's a place I normally avoid during high traffic times, especially on a bad hair day. But, I could've been bald for all I cared today. It's surprising how things like looks don't matter when your primary concern is just getting through a difficult door. There we were at the doors. I had forgotten to tell my clueless blind clinger that we were stopping, and I felt her bump into the wheelchair as I rolled to a stop. I pushed the automatic door opener and was amused to find that the doors opened toward me. I wheeled back a few feet to avoid getting smacked and went inside.

KELLY

We were in the Union. There were so many sounds at once. I felt overloaded. A friend approached Cambi with questions about the wheelchair. Who was it? It was someone she knew, so Cambi told me the woman's name and told the woman mine. Then they talked. I didn't know what the woman looked like. I couldn't see who she was looking at. Even though we'd been introduced, I didn't feel like I'd met her. I felt excluded. I felt a desperate need to be addressed directly. I felt a need to be talked to. I interrupted the conversation to give myself the reassurance that they still knew I was there. I could feel people everywhere around me, but I didn't feel like one of them.

CAMBI

I was glad Kelly couldn't see anything, because it wouldn't have been conducive to her already panicky state. Even I was scared when I thought about how we were going to manage to eat. It was straight-up noon and people were darting everywhere. A girl with big hair and wearing a dress with orange flowers gave us a sharp look and hurried over to her friends. I wheeled by them and glanced back to see looks of both amusement and confusion. I wondered which was worse, seeing all of these looks and having to look back, or being completely oblivious to them.

KELLY

We went into the cafeteria. The smells of jalapeno and grease made my stomach flip. My grip tightened again on Cambi's chair. I knew there were a lot of people. The noise was almost deafening. All I wanted was a cola drink and some ice cream. Cambi couldn't reach the fountain from her chair, so I had to get my own drink. She directed me, but I still ended up with soda all over my hand and sleeve before I was done. The ice cream was easier to get _ all we had to do was order it. Cambi showed me what money to give the attendant.

A man approached us when we were finishing our lunch. He spoke to Cambi about the wheelchair. He also talked to me. He was the only one all day who spoke to me.

CAMBI

"Is this thing collapsible?" he asked. We explained to him that we were doing an experiment, and he smiled. I noticed that he was looking at Kelly the whole time, even though he knew she was blind. He told us he had met his wife, who was in a wheelchair, in college. He had originally been trying to get a date with her blind roommate. His eyes sparkled as he told us what a sight they made rolling and stumbling around campus. I was touched as I realized all he had been through and here, and we were bitching and moaning about 10 hours of helplessness.

After he left, I decided to lighten the mood by playing a trick on Kelly before we left the Union. I wanted to see how she would respond to silence. She asked a question. She asked again, the desperation growing in her voice.

KELLY

"Cambi? Are you still there?"

CAMBI

I didn't let this go too long, because she looked like she was about to cry.

Of rats and kids

BY CYNTHIA SCHMIDT

When you were growing up, did you ever wonder who put the gum in the penny gum machines?

When I was growing up, I knew who put the gum in the penny gum machines.

My dad was the bubble gum guy.

Actually, my dad was the gas station guy. I grew up behind a Hudson gas station in North Platte, Neb.

My father was the manager of the gas station. However, with a wife and five kids, he always worked an extra job or two.

The summer I was six, my dad's extra job was supplying all the penny gum ball machines in North Platte. Best of all, he kept the gum at home. It took us kids a while to find the gum because he hid it on a shelf in the basement.

The basement was creepy, especially to a six-year-old. It was one of those old cement basements with sloping walls and no windows, as I recall. It probably did have windows, but all I remember are three or four bare bulbs with pull chains.

The steps leading down to the basement were narrow, wooden and creaky. I know the washer was probably in the basement, but I cannot locate it in my memory. Even now, I could lead you to the south wall where the bubble gum was stored in boxes.

Oh, what a pirate's treasure chest they were! I'm certain the boxes contained millions of gum balls in thousands of colors. Oh, how bright and shiny gleamed the gum in that gloomy basement!

I don't recall exactly how we reached the shelf, but it became a daily ritual for us to grad a handful of those irresistible gum balls and stuff them in our pockets. I always had my two partners in crime: my little sister and brother, ages four and two.

After stuffing our pockets, we'd rush up the back basement steps, through the double wooden cellar doors and out into the sunshine. I can vividly recall how blue the sky seemed, how carefree our lives.

Our minds and hearts were unburdened by guilt or fear. The concept of stealing was unknown to us. In fact, each week when dad filled the machines, he put in a penny or two so kids like us could find a few gum balls just waiting for us.

It seemed every time mom took us to Sears, gum was magically waiting for us there. She always reassured us it was dad's way of surprising us.

even better than our father surprising us was the fact that we could impress our friends. we had so many friends that summer.

Still, all good things must come to an end; and so did our bubble gum adventure. Eventually, dad figured things out. I think possibly they knew all along and were waiting for us to tire of the gum. Foolish parents!

Finally, one day at lunch, my father off-handedly remarked, "You kids shouldn't go in the basement any more."

We exchanged guilty glances, and one of us asked, "Why?"

Straight-faced, he answered, "We have rats in the basement."

"Rats?" three voices cried out simultaneously, spoons suspended in mid-air.

"Yep," he continued calmly, "rats in the basement." (I can still see him buttering his bread.)

"Are there very many rats?" a tiny timid voice asked (maybe mine).

"Oh," he replied nonchalantly, "about three." (At this point, he was chewing his bread and butter.)

Again, a tiny voice, "Are the rats very big?" (We had never seen a rat, but just knew they had to be big.)

Looking directly at Cathy, Chucky and I, he soberly informed us, "Well, there's one about the size of you," (he pointed at me with his fork) "and you," (now the fork was aimed at Cathy, who was exchanging fearful glances with me) "and a little one about your size."

At that point, Chucky's big blue eyes got bigger and bluer. "Will they bite us?" he asked.

"Nope," my dad replied, "but they've been eating my bubble gum."

That was the end of the conversation and the end of the bubble gum adventures.

You know, it took us kids 20 years to figure out who the rats were.

FINANCIAL AID

Loans may be tougher to get

AMY COX
Collegian

Student loan applicants during 1992 may find it harder to qualify for a Stafford Loan, and those who counted on it to finance their education may be left with few options.

A bill President Bush signed into law Nov. 15 requires student loan applicants to submit to a credit history check. The law may also require the student to pay for the credit check.

Previously, the federally insured Stafford Loan, formerly the Guaranteed Student Loan, made it possible for students to obtain a loan if they were in financial need, regardless of their credit history.

Thanks to the rider to Public Law 102-164, an unemployment bill, however, students who have a less-than-desirable credit history may be out of luck.

The bill is now law, but it may be next year before students feel its effect, because most financial aid for this year was applied for in advance, before the law was enacted.

Larry Becker, director of Career & Financial Aid Planners Inc. in Wichita, helps more than 100 K-State students obtain financial aid each semester.

Becker said he has yet to see a decrease in the number of students who are able to receive a Stafford Loan, but he said he anticipates he will for the upcoming 1992-1993 school year.

In addition to the credit check requirement for the Stafford Loan, Becker said a credit check is now required for the Student Loan Supplement, which is usually the next best alternative to a Stafford Loan.

"Like the Stafford, the SLS enables a single, independent student without any established credit to get a loan, because it is federally guaranteed," Becker said.

"Normally," he said, "a student is not going to be able to walk into a bank and get a loan." This came about basically to keep students from taking out a loan only to drop out of school and default on it. A student also has to be in school for 30 days before applying for a Stafford Loan for the same reason, he said.

"This is mainly going to hit low-income families, who cannot get a loan otherwise."

This concern for low-income families has caused Congress to get negative feedback. Annita Huff, assistant director of the Office of Stu-

Finney's new budget plan —

Will it work?

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

TOPEKA — Gov. Joan Finney recommended an appealing budget emphasizing no new taxes during her State of the State address Tuesday, however, many legislators said her plan was not realistic.

Finney spoke to a joint session of the House and Senate and revealed her 1993 fiscal year budget recommendations for all state agencies. The fiscal year begins July 1.

Her main focus was property tax relief to the tune of $217 million. This will be done by creating a statewide 45-mill tax levy, which would lower taxes in 253 of Kansas' 304 school districts.

Finney also placed solid support behind higher education, social services, a presidential-preference primary and the comprehensive highway plan.

"This can be accomplished with no new taxes," Finney said.

Positive recommendations for K-State included establishing pay-plan step movements and recognition for classified employees, a 2.5 percent merit pool for salary enhancements for unclassified employees and full funding of the enrollment adjustment.

She also indicated funds will be available to K-State for other operating expenses.

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said other operating expenses have been consistently slashed from K-State's budget, and the indication was good news.

"The faculty at Kansas State has had an increasingly difficult time, because they don't have the materials to deliver quality education," he said. "This is just as important as salaries in many people's minds."

President Jon Wefald said the governor's recommendations represent a positive step forward, especially considering the state of the economy.

"This gives us the chance to convince the Legislature that her recommendations are good. We'll fight for that," he said. "I'm somewhat optimistic that we have a pretty good chance to get what she recommended."

Legislators warned, however, that all of Finney's promises can not realistically be kept.

"I can't imagine the dollars available can pay for what she's advocated," said Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. "At this point in time it's impossible."

According to Finney's proposal, the financial shortfall that will result from the lowering of all property tax mill levies to 45 could be replenished three ways.

Revenues from a video lottery in Kansas, which would have to be authorized by the Legislature, would make up part of the loss. Closing loopholes on currently exempted transactions would raise $105 million in sales taxes, which would stay at the existing rate. Adjusting required general fund ending balances from $125 million to $100 million would free up $25 million this fiscal year.

Most criticism of Finney's address centered on these three revenue-enhancement methods.

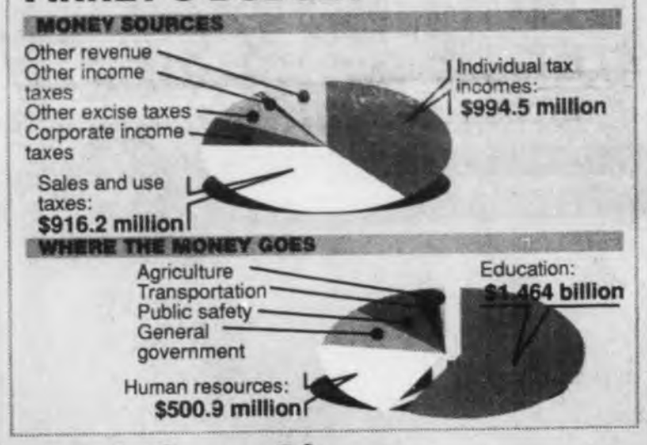
"She proposed using slot machines to pay for education. It's an unsound way of proposing dollars for something like education," Bogina said. "They project it will raise between $50 million and $84 million. I don't think either one is right."

MARGARET CLARKIN/Collegian

Kansas Gov. Joan Finney delivers her State of the State Address in the House of Representatives chamber in the Statehouse Tuesday morning in Topeka. Finney said property taxes must be lowered.

Glasscock said he agreed a video lottery is an unstable long-term source of revenue.

"You've got to ask, do you want to build your budget on the basis of a marginal revenue source? A source you're not sure about?" he said.



Many legislators had problems accepting Finney's proposal to repeal $105 million worth of sales tax exemptions. Complaints ranged from Finney's failure to provide specifics about which exemptions should be closed to the potential economic harm caused by the closure of the exemptions.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she wished Finney would

WHERE THE MONEY GOES

Judge forces state to address school funding

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

A battle that began in the courts of Shawnee County will now be fought out in Topeka.

During the past two years, 42 Kansas school districts have filed four lawsuits against the state of Kansas concerning the constitutionality of methods used to finance public education.

Concerns ranged from accusations that Kansas does not provide equal aid for school district capital expenditures to a belief that the taxable income of the districts occupies too prominent a place in the state's budget, Ben Barrett of the Kansas Legislative Research Department said.

These lawsuits were placed in the hands of Judge Terry Bullock of the Shawnee County District Court. Rather than make a ruling on the case, Bullock ordered state legislators to find a way for the state to equitably fund education.

If the Legislature cannot iron out an equitable plan this session, Bullock said, he will then decide the matter in his court.

As a result of his comments, Gov. Joan Finney and the Legislature created a task force this summer to address restructuring finance for public education.

After receiving the recommendations from the task force, Finney announced support for a bill to implement a statewide 45-mill property tax levy. Rep. Rick Bowden, D-Goddard, will file the bill.

While this statewide mill levy would cut property taxes in 253 of the state's 304 districts, area legislators say the facts are being buried in the hoopla.

"The misinformation is that 45 mills will do it," said Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan. "It doesn't raise the amount the schools will get. It will be about $200 million short. That part of the story isn't being told."

Manhattan, which currently has 75 mills, would lose 30 mills, said Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan.

"That revenue will have to be made up, otherwise there will be a $200-million hit across the state," she said.

Oleen said to avoid losing money, the statewide mill levy would have to be 58.

"Finney's brought it down quite a bit. But, the bottom line is that we're $200 million short," she said.

Finney outlined a three-part proposal to raise the revenue during her State of the State address.

But before worrying about how the money will be made up, the 45 mill levy bill has to pass. Oleen said that will be no easy task.

Slattery stresses looking ahead

600 people attend speech to voice opinions to Democrat

ANDREW WOODWARD
Collegian

Rep. Jim Slattery listened Tuesday night as about 600 people voiced their opinions on the nation's ailing health-care system during a town meeting in Union Forum Hall.

The Kansas Democrat began the meeting by discussing the pros and cons of the two types of reformed health-care systems being discussed in Congress. The night concluded with a question and answer session.

Slattery is conducting town meetings across northeast Kansas to receive feedback on the health-care crisis.

According to Slattery, the plans receiving the most negative feedback locally and nationwide are

TO OUR READERS

This isn't the paper we hoped to present to you this morning. We were preparing a beautiful paper launching a new design. And we were using a new software to do it. Then, for reasons unknown to us at this time, the new software began sending blank pages to our laser printer. It also made some of the computer files containing the pages unreadable after not printing them.

Early this morning, it became clear that the choice before us was to either print a much smaller paper or not print one at all. I made the decision to print the smaller paper, which necessitated dumping all the sports and news content from the inside of the paper.

For this I apologize.

We'll solve our problems and make up for this issue in the remaining 74 issues of the semester.

Thank you for your patience.

COLLEGIAN OPINION

SCHOOL TAX COMPARISON

■ Parsons has the state's highest school district mill levy at 97.84 mills. The lowest is Burlington with 9.12. Gov. Joan Finney has proposed a statewide 45-mill levy that would result in property tax breaks for residents in 253 of the state's 304 school districts.

EDITORIALS

School district reform, finally

Hats off to Judge Terry Bullock for doing something a lot of Kansans have wanted someone to do for a very long time — make education fair and equal for our state's youth.

Bullock's Shawnee County District Court sent an ultimatum to the state Legislature.

Something must change, he said, by the end of this session, or he will take matters into his own hands.

During the past two years, 42 school districts have filed suit against the state of Kansas concerning the constitutionality of the state's school finance system.

Gov. Joan Finney and the Legislature, at Bullock's prompting, created a task force this summer to look into it. And now the governor has announced support for the task force's suggested 45-mill property tax levy.

But, this is no perfect solution.

The majority of Kansas counties will receive less money from property taxes for education. Only a few will get more.

This may be equal, but it's hardly fair.

And opponents argue giving so much power over school districts to the state of Kansas will lead to socialized education.

Some change, however, is better than nothing.

It doesn't take a genius to figure out that something is wrong when people in one county pay 97.84 mills, and people in another county pay 9.12 mills.

Property taxes and petty politics probably don't mean anything to these kids. All they want is a fair chance — a chance that has nothing to do with how much their parents make or what neighborhood or county they live in.

That's what public education is all about, and it's about time someone reminded us of that.

Bullock got Finney to act for school districts. Now, someone needs to get her to act for higher education.

Government wheels spin when state judiciary speaks

Kansas needs to move its lawmaking branch of government out of the courtrooms.

Lately, it seems Kansas citizens must use the judicial branch to get the attention of the legislative and executive branches in Topeka.

The latest example of this is the lawsuit against the state over its school district finance formula. Shawnee County District Judge Terry Bullock issued his opinion in October, questioning the constitutionality of the present formula.

Now, at the opening of the 1992 legislative session, lawmakers are talking about a careful examination of the way public schools are financed.

This is not the first time the wheels of state government have been set in motion by a court decision. During the past couple of years, state mental hospital, prison and property tax reforms have seen their beginnings in a Kansas courtroom.

This reactive approach to creating legislation must be ended if Kansas is to have an effective government.

Lawmakers can do this by listening to their constituents. Sure, senators and representatives have always had town meetings where they supposedly find out what's concerning the residents there.

But, somehow, the messages aren't reaching the Statehouse floor.

If senators and representatives would listen to constituents' concerns, the efficiency of the session would increase tremendously.

And with the grueling session that lawmakers say they are facing, that's what they will be needing a lot of during the next few months.

Maybe Kansas will see a change in the way legislation begins in the future, with legislators becoming more proactive.

Until then, if you want something done, sue the state.

In search of America

ERIC BECKER

I lost a filling on a 10-hour drive to Red River, N.M., during Christmas vacation. I was driving through the panhandle of Oklahoma in my car, chewing a wad of Big Red™ gum. Something rattled in my jaw. The gum got lumpy, and I found the little nugget when I spit it into my hand.

It looked like a little battered piece of tin. I wished it was gold. I'd always wanted a gold tooth.

My tongue found the place from which the filling had fallen. There was a little crevice in the bottom of the tooth. But by the time I reached Raton, I'd forgotten about it.

After passing through Raton, I stopped at a station on the outskirts of the city. I filled up the car with gas and went in to pay.

The man behind the counter had a big cold brow and a mustache that looked as if it might catch the icicles that fell from that brow in the winter. He seemed a little suspicious of me, but I paid him in cash. I decided to make sure I knew where I was going, so I asked him the way.

"Does this road lead to Red River? Am I going the right way?"

He didn't seem to look at me as he answered. "That road goes to Red River," he said easily enough, "but I wouldn't know if you're going the right way. ..."

This last remark confused me. I looked back at my car through the front window of the station. It seemed obvious enough to me which direction I was heading, considering the position of my car. I'd come through Raton and was continuing on the highway. I'd only asked for reassurance. What was the puzzle?

"No, I'm not going to ski. I'm going to find America."

The man seemed to notice my confusion without looking at me, and said again, "I wouldn't know if you're going the right way without knowing what it is you're going to do. Are you going to ski?"

I shook my head. "No, I'm not going to ski. I'm going to find America," I explained, my chest swelling.

"I doubt it," he said stoically, still not meeting my eyes. "You're going the wrong direction for that."

I was a little annoyed that I had let this man invade my vacation plans, but it didn't seem right to let it lie. "No?" I asked, trying to sound as genuinely surprised as I'd have been if I'd found out I was on the road for Denver and not Red River. "Which direction should I be going, then?"

"Why, west, of course. But it's easier to ski, anyhow," he said, and almost to himself: "No skiing west. Good skiing in Red River, though."

Having never seen this part of the country before, and having already driven eight hours, I went back to my car and kept on the road to Red River.

It was a little Wal-Mart of a mountain village. Main Street was a half-mile long and bordered by restaurants, lodges, apparel stores, ski and snowmobile rental spots, and souvenir shops. Although I had planned to spend my time finding a way into the surrounding mountains, it was the souvenir shops that took up my time once I arrived.

They all sold the same kind of things: toy miniature frozen flintlocks, "Indian" headdresses with dyed royal blue feathers, pens and paperweights, and, of course, the obligatory postcards of local mountain and valley scenes — even a "gold nugget" I thought might be melted down into a tooth.

I bought them all. And once I began, I couldn't seem to stop buying. I was in a whirlwind of consumership. Each purchase seemed to be a proof of something, though I hardly seemed to be thinking about it at the time.

I didn't ski.

On the way back into Raton I stopped at the station again, intent upon showing the man how wrong he had been. But he wasn't there. Someone else was behind the counter. I was a little disappointed, but my injured tooth was aching by that time, and it didn't seem like a good idea to wait around for the man.

It was probably just as well. If he'd seen how much of America I'd brought back with me from Red River, he probably wouldn't have believed his eyes.

Relationships 101: Instructions required

CARLA JONES

Relationships are life activities that should come with instruction books. Each relationship should have a personalized book, because there is no formulating relationships into categories.

I can just see it now: Mass production of guidebooks to any type of relationship you want to buy a guide for — found in the self-help section of the bookstores, of course. The broad categories would be familyships, loveships, friendships, workships and warships.

These guidebooks would tell you how to deal with almost every deviation imaginable under the general headings of family, love, friends, work and war.

They would also deal with the opposite situation. Family would tell how to treat a person after they had been divorced or disowned. Love would also guide you through the proper steps of hate, friends and enemies, work and unemployment, and war and peace.

Relationships would follow these guidelines, because that's just the way it would be. It sounds simple and easy. But then, so did life in George Orwell's "1984."

The fact is, relationships cannot be formulated. They do not follow a guidebook, and they certainly are not easy. Relationships touch every aspect of our lives. They affect our moods, our health and the choices we make. They're everywhere; they're everywhere.

One of the relationships I would like a guidebook for is the relationship I have with my ex-husband. Two years ago, we got a divorce because we were too young to handle marriage. After the divorce, we had not spoken to each other for a year. (See "Familyships" under "When your ex-spouse is no longer speaking to you and wants to see you dead.")

I went to visit my parents for four days during the semester break. During that time, my ex sent me a letter with a big peace sign drawn on the envelope. He wanted to bury the hatchet — and not in my forehead.

I went to see him, and we spent 17 hours talking about who we had become, what had happened to us and where we were headed.

It was as if I had seen him the week before, not the December before. He had changed. I had changed. We were civil. It was nice. We realized we still cared for each other, and that we might actually be able to be friends. After all, we were friends before we were married and while we were married.

My parents were very distressed. His parents were very distressed. What were we doing? We are divorced. We're not supposed to be speaking to each other, much less working on a friendship with each other.

Nothing like this had ever happened in either family before. Where was the guidebook? Where could the "parentals" find it written that this just wasn't supposed to happen? They had to have proof that it was wrong, because this just wasn't normal. Or was it?

Unfortunately, relationships don't come with guidebooks. Divorce wasn't easy. I was the first person in four generations of my family to get a divorce. I really didn't have anyone or anything to help guide me through it. I didn't know what to expect. I still don't know what to expect.

There are no guidebooks for this, but there are other people who have been through divorce. Recently, they have become an invaluable resource to me. They helped me realize I wasn't going crazy and that it wasn't all my fault.

They also helped me realize one important aspect of working through divorce: You don't have to do it alone.

Finney

have given the Legislature some direction.

"She didn't specify exemptions to be closed, because she did not want people to be mad at her," she said. "We've already been down this path before."

Some current tax exemptions that may be repealed include aircraft sales and repair; textbook rentals; lease/rental of films, records and tapes; free meals to restaurant employees; residential use of electricity, gas and water; lottery tickets and farm machinery.

"Those were enacted for a purpose — to save agriculture," Bogina said. "And, the day we repeal the one for aircraft, Boeing will transfer to Seattle."

Supporters of the repeal, however, said the exemptions are merely loopholes created for special interests.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said she agreed it would be detrimental to lose a big employer such as Boeing, but the state should not be held hostage.

"Every time we say we might tax something, we get threats. I'd like to see some evidence to that," she said. "Finney is right about some sales tax exemptions needing to come off. I don't know if they will add up to $105 million. But, exempting private airplanes? That's crazy."

Glasscock also questioned the exemptions because Finney said there would be no new taxes.

"Call it what you want, but it's a tax increase," he said. "People weren't paying it before, and if you institute it they will. That's a new tax."

Finney

the governor, said Finney merely wants an equitable tax structure, and the key is closing loopholes.

"The governor didn't specify which exemptions should be repealed because she wanted to leave everything open to discussion. The only exemption she is not in favor of repealing is prescription drugs," Cook said. "And, it's not a new tax. This is a loophole she wants to get rid of."

Finney's last revenue enhancement proposal, to lower the required ending balance of the state's cash reserves to $100 million, was not spared from the criticism.

Bogina said he had no problem with it, but Glasscock said he disapproved of spending the state's savings account.

"There is not an opportunity to spend it down every year. Once you spend it down, you don't have it anymore. She's approaching treacherous ground," Glasscock said.

Bogina said there is a lot to be done this session but that everything will be predicated on Finney's proposed statewide mill levy to equitably fund the school districts.

"We're under a court order to modify that. That must be done first. If no additional money is needed for that, that's one issue. If it does require more revenue to be raised, that could pose a problem," he said.

SILKY SUMMER LEGS
WAXING:
Waxing is a procedure of hair removal using a warm, honey like wax to remove the entire hair. As a result, the hair grows back soft and new, you do not experience coarse stubble. Most of our clients find that they can go longer each time they are waxed, but generally speaking, you on go 4-8 weeks between appointments.
Please stop removing your hair (tweezing, shaving, etc...) enough in advance to have at least 1/8 inch growth (at least 10 days growth.)
If you have a special swimsuit, you may wish to bring it with you.
Tess has twenty years experience with our French methods of waxing. Please take advantage of her special introductory discount.

WORK SMARTER. NOT HARDER.
We're working smarter, too. So you don't have to work harder.
For us, it means an ongoing relationship with educators and professors, striving to understand what's needed to help them make math concepts come alive.
It means continually working with students like you, discovering firsthand what you expect from the calculator you select.
The result? Calculators that are highly recommended by your teachers and peers. Calculators that are perfectly matched to your major and your coursework.
The TI-81 is a perfect example. It offers the most comprehensive, easy-to-use graphing features available with extensive programming capabilities.
And there are others. Like the TI-68, an advanced scientific that solves up to five simultaneous equations, performs complex numbers and offers formula programming.

The TI-36X SOLAR, a general purpose workhorse powered by ANYLITE™ solar cells so you never need batteries.

The BA II PLUS™. For business students, this is the one to get. It handles time-value-of-money and offers cash flow analysis for internal rate of return (IRR) and net present value (NPV). Plus a whole lot more.
No matter what your major, no matter what the course, there's a TI scientific or business calculator that's right for you. Do the smart thing: make one of them a part of your professional personality now, and for the years to come.
You'll be on your way to working smarter. Instead of harder.
Try the entire line of TI scientific and business calculators at your local TI retailer.

Slattery

those plans involving mandatory employer-sponsored health care, or "pay-or-play" plans.

"When the people I have visited understand the cost involved with the employer-based solutions, they are not enthusiastic, especially when they realize much of the burden will land on small businesses with 10 or 12 employees," Slattery said.

One of Slattery's recurring themes was the importance of looking to the future.

"Kids need to be our priority, and while dealing with health care, I want to focus on the young people," Slattery said.

He expressed his sympathy for the 21.9 percent of those ages 16 to 24 who cannot afford health insurance. Slattery also deflected criticism accusing the health-care system of catering to the old.

"The most powerful voting voice in America is 65 and over, and politicians know this," Slattery said.

Slattery also emphasized the importance of reforming health care as far as reducing the percentage of the country's gross national product that goes towards health care.

"The quality of goods will go down because employers are spending more on health care and less on improving the quality of the good," Slattery said, referring to the dangers of an employer-based reform.

During the question and answer session, Manhattan Mayor Gene Klingler, a local surgeon, told Slattery he was skeptical any changes would be made.

Klingler compared the health care system to a "giant medical tar baby," with one aspect being repaired while other aspects grow worse. Klingler suggested stricter national health care policies, favoring "bed confinement instead of a new heart."

According to David Yetter, assistant professor of mathematics, the current health-care system in the United States is a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and comparable to the last remnant of a medieval guild.

Yetter, a resident of Canada for 13 months, criticized the Canadian system of national health care. One proposed solution before Congress is a single-payor system modeled on the existing Canadian system.

dent Financial Assistance, said Congress, therefore, is now considering a bill that would rescind the law.

"It is a federal law, but a determination has not been made yet. However, if it is not rescinded, the University has no choice but to comply," she said.

Students with a bad credit history will still have one option if the law is kept, Huff said.

"All that is needed is a creditworthy co-signer for the loan to help ensure the student will not default," she said.

Students enrolling for this semester should find their financial aid waiting for them, Huff said.

She said financial aid checks that are not in on time are usually because of transferring, exclusion (not completing enough credit hours) or not completing paperwork on time.

"Our only real problem is the student who decided in December to attend school in January and applied for financial aid. When a check is not in, there is usually a deferment available," she said.

Several finals stolen; students, professors angry

JULIE LONG
Collegian

Copies of several exams were taken from the offices of instructors during finals week in December.

Sometime between Friday, Dec. 13, 1991, and Monday, Dec. 16, 1991, a final for Principles of Macroeconomics was stolen from the office of Susan Taylor, assistant professor of economics.

To enter Taylor's office after hours, the hall door and the door to her office must be unlocked.

There was no sign of a forced entry, Taylor said, and both doors were locked Monday morning when she arrived.

The copy in Taylor's desk was the only copy of the final. She said the secretary in the main office had found the last page of an economics exam in the public copy machine on the third floor of Waters Hall.

The secretary checked with the professors in the department to make sure it was not a current final. Taylor said she checked her desk and found the last page of her final missing. It matched the one left in the copy machine.

The Department of Economics filed a report with the K-State Police. Lt. Robert Mellgren said the campus police are still investigating the matter.

After she discovered her final had been stolen, Taylor said, a student called her. The student, who would not give Taylor her name, was angry because she had seen students making copies of the final at the K-State Union Copy Center.

Because the final was administered Wednesday morning, Taylor said, she was allowed to make a new exam.

"I made out a new exam immediately," Taylor said. "I was very angry."

Other tests reportedly stolen were finals for Industrial and Labor Relations, Managerial Accounting and Introduction to Personal Computers.

Stanley Elsea, associate professor of management, said students told him a copy of his test was available, so he re-wrote his exam the night before. He said there was no sign of a forced entry.

Campus police had reports of burglaries at Calvin Hall, Kedzie Hall and two at Waters Hall. Mellgren said they were reported Dec. 15, 16, 17 and 19. The campus police do not know what day or what time they occurred.

Mellgren said he thought the burglaries were related because they all

ASK meeting ends in tension, bad feelings

McClaskey says she has K-State's best interests in mind

ANDREW WOODWARD
Collegian

Opinions differ over Student Body President Jackie McClaskey's behavior during the last meeting for the Associated Students of Kansas Dec. 7 at K-State.

ASK lobbies in Topeka to collectively benefit the six Kansas Board of Regents institutions.

Tensions increased at the ASK meeting during the prioritization of a list of needs to be sent to Topeka. Some chairmen from other schools said they found McClaskey's demand that capital improvements be placed above additional financial aid was biased toward K-State and unfair.

An increase in capital improvements would aid the enhancement of Farrell Library.

Jim Allen, ASK chairman at Pittsburgh State University, disagreed with McClaskey's priorities. He said he would rather have capital improvements rank third on the list of needs instead of second, as McClaskey proposed.

"To have ASK be successful, we have to have everyone cooperate," Allen said. "Her behavior was a little uncalled for. She kind of hurt herself right off."

Jim Persinger, junior in political science and ASK chairman at K-State, said McClaskey's proposal was not self-serving, but simply what ASK is supposed to do.

"The time has come for action. K-State students have taken a stand by recording a 97-percent vote on the Farrell Library referendum," Persinger said. "McClaskey did what was appropriate in looking out for K-State's best interests."

McClaskey agrees.

"I was elected to represent K-State, not ASK," she said. "They were asking me to compromise something that concerns K-State students."

FROM THE PERSIAN GULF

DAVID FRESE

First things first. Robert Eskildsen had to make sure his daughter would be taken care of. He ate his Christmas dinner with her and his momma, fearing the phone would ring too soon. It didn't, but for the next two days he stayed awake.

Then the call came. The 1st Battalion of the 16th Infantry would be leaving Fort Riley at 1200 hours, 27 December 1990.

His daughter with her grandma, Sgt. Eskildsen loaded up on a bus with no heat. Topeka was an hour away. New York was three by plane. Saudi Arabia was so far away for someone who'd never been out of the States. He fell asleep, his head propped on his field jacket against the frosty window.

Eskildsen's battalion mate, Staff Sgt. Rowland Bass, had kissed his wife and his own daughter goodbye from Marshall Army Airfield the day before, knowing all the way to the desert it would have to last a long time, thinking it might be forever.

The desert sand blew in Bass's eyes as he stood outside in the night 50 feet and four minutes from where his plane landed. The battalion marched to another bus and drove for four hours to Kobhar Towers, a huge apartment complex the Saudis had given to the U.S. forces. Bass was surprised to see some soldiers he had met in Germany years before there waiting for the bus.

While Bass waited for the battalion's baggage, the 1st Sergeant went inside to find where Bass's company was to be sleeping. They signed in and waited some more. The baggage came, but it was dumped in the street four blocks away.

Nobody in Eskildsen's group had been to war before, not even the older guys, but occasionally they stayed up and talked about it, joking sometimes. Eskildsen's biggest worry was whether he'd be able to get a soda that day in Kobhar Towers. He just wanted the whole thing to be over, because staying in the Towers was like a prison. No one could go anywhere, and the higher-ups were doing everything to keep the soldiers busy — finding different "duties," a B.S. watch here and

NEWS DIGEST

▶ BOY, 4, FOUND DEAD

A 4-year-old boy was found dead Wednesday morning by his mother at the family's quarters at Fort Riley.

Jennifer Ments said she called for an ambulance at about 10:15 a.m. when she discovered her son, Jamil, unresponsive in bed. He was pronounced dead at the scene at 10:30 a.m.

The cause of death has not been determined.

The Criminal Investigation Division is investigating the death.

Jamil was the son of Spec. Kevin Ments, 1st Personal Services Company, and Jennifer Ments.

▶ INDEPENDENCE DECRIED

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia (AP) — The Yugoslav federal government decried the recognition Wednesday of Slovenia and Croatia by the European Community.

In Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia-Hercegovina, the prime minister of that Yugoslav republic said it would be his country's turn for independence next.

Germany led the push for EC recognition.

▶ U.S. SPY PLANE MISSING

WASHINGTON (AP) — An American U-2 spy plane on a reconnaissance mission is lost at sea south of the demilitarized zone between North and South Korea, Pentagon officials said Wednesday.

A Pentagon spokesman said the aircraft's loss was not due to hostile action. The pilot's fate is unknown.

▶ PEACE TALKS EXTENDED

WASHINGTON (AP) — Israel extended peace talks Wednesday with delegations from its Arab neighbors for another day. Negotiations are mired in wrangling over West Bank settlements.

▶ GATES WARNS ABOUT IRAQ

WASHINGTON (AP) — CIA Director Robert Gates told a Senate panel Wednesday Iraq will gain a nuclear weapons capability within a few years.

A poll revealed two-thirds of Americans favor using force to prevent Iraq gaining nuclear weapons.

Enrollment on main campus decreases

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian

Preliminary enrollment figures show a decrease in students for the main campus and an increase for K-State-Salina.

"The merger is doing what it was meant to do," said Jerry Cole, K-State-Salina interim dean. "We're at least starting to become successful as far as generating more credit hours per student — fewer students are taking more hours."

According to preliminary figures, 641 students from the Salina campus and 17,168 students from the main campus have enrolled. The main campus enrollment is down 1 percent from the spring semester of last year, University Registrar Don Foster said.

The decrease for the main campus can be attributed to a smaller class of incoming freshmen because there are fewer graduating high-school seniors, Foster said. But, the decrease was anticipated, he said.

"Our decrease has been right on target as we expected," Foster said. "This supports our prediction that enrollment will continue to drop for another year or so and then increase sharply."

Foster said he expects the 20th-day, spring on-campus enrollment to be 19,460. This prediction includes both campuses and is based on previous late enrollment patterns and off-campus figures not included in the preliminary numbers.

K-State will be able to meet stabilization if projections for the 20th-day enrollment figures are correct, Foster said.

"Ideally, we want to stabilize at between 20,000 and 21,000 for the fall semester and 19,000 to 20,000 for the spring semester," Foster said.

Students had more difficulty getting a full schedule this spring because there were so many closed classes, Foster said. There were also fewer day and night class options, he said.

President Jon Wefald said he appreciated the patience of students, faculty and staff during spring enrollment.

"Our students, faculty and staff have shown remarkable patience in dealing with the tight availability of courses," Wefald said. "It was clear that students understood the closed classes were caused by budget difficulties beyond our control.

Community joins businesses, radio to aid fire victims

ERIN PERRY
Collegian

Laramie Street looks like it's missing a tooth where 327 used to be.

Five and a half months after fire consumed the house Joe and Tammi Cervantes rented, a bulldozer sits poised behind the pile of rubble left behind: splintered and charred boards, chunks of gray roof tiles, a piece of faded green carpet.

Neither the couple nor their 2-year-old son, Matthew, lost their lives in the blaze — caused by a smoldering cigarette lodged in a couch — but they did lose nearly all of their possessions. Replaceable things, mostly, except for those items touched by sentiment.

But within days, most of their material things were replaced by an outpouring of donations from the Manhattan community. Almost from the moment news of the fire broke, radio publicity alerted people to the Cervantes' needs.

Sister stations KMKF-FM 101.5 and KMAN-AM 1350 started a drive to collect for the family almost immediately. That night, KMAN program director Dave Lewis got a call from his landlord's superintendent, who lived near Tammi's grandparents, asking Dave to do what he could as a radio personality to help.

With help from K-Rock morning disc jockey Shane Sellers, Lewis designated the St. Mary Hospital as a drop-off point for donations. The next day, K-Rock did a live remote from a donation site in Triangle Park.

That's when what began as a modest effort grew into a deluge of furniture, appliances, clothes, food and money.

"We had no idea it was going to snowball as well as it did," Sellers said.

"At Triangle Park, we had tons of stuff donated: couches, lamps, beds."

Citizen's Bank and Trust set up an account to deposit the donated money.

The fire's effects extended beyond damage to property. Joe Cervantes, who works for Steel and Pipe Supply Co., lost his steel-toed work boots in the blaze. Without them, he couldn't work. Without work, the family would be in an even bigger bind.

So, Sellers said, one of the drive's primary goals became raising money to replace those boots.

Cash donations totaled about $1,500, enough for not only the boots, but for the family to buy a new couch and, better yet, make a deposit on a trailer at Walnut Grove Mobile Home Park.

Efforts were made to reach Joe and Tammi Cervantes for this article, but a current phone number and address were unavailable.

The community managed to provide them with almost everything they needed to fill that new home, and then some. From the pool of donated items, the family took two van loads and another truckload, and Lewis said almost that much was left over.

Another priority the drive met was fulfilling little Matthew's needs for clothes and supplies.

Although Godfather's Pizza gave away slices of pizza at the drop-off sites, Lewis said the victims' needs were all the incentive most donors needed.

Godfather's involvement in the cause didn't end there. The night after the fire, the restaurant served a free dinner to the Cervanteses. After hearing about the fire, manager David Umscheid called K-Rock and asked what his store could do to help.

"I thought it would be a good gesture," Umscheid said.

"They were down about losing the house, of course. But it (the dinner) helped them a lot."

That kind of charity was evidence of a certain altruism Lewis said has probably all but disappeared from bigger cities.

"It shows we've got a community of people here who are concerned about other people," he said.

The radio's ability to send a constant message about the fire's destruction also helped the drive work.

"It was a success because we were able to respond with such quickness," Lewis said.

At 4:23 p.m., security at Alco, 3007 Anderson Ave., reported a shoplifter. Ruth M. Baxter, 1102 Dexter St., Clay Center, was arrested and issued a notice to appear. Taken were two wallets and a package of balloons. Loss was $13.

KONZA PRAIRIE

Professor coordinates Konza research

The Konza Prairie has a new acting coordinator in Ted Barkley, professor of biology, who has been teaching at K-State for 31 years.

The Division of Biology has appointed Ted Barkley, professor of biology, as the acting coordinator of the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area.

Barkley returns to the position after having served as coordinator from 1987 to 1990.

In order to accept the position of acting coordinator, Barkley postponed a sabbatical in Mexico. He replaces Donald Kaufman, professor of biology, who ended his term so he could return to teaching and complete his research on small mammals.

"We'll be out to enhance the relevance of the research that occurs on the prairie," Barkley said.

He also said he will consider the research successful as long as they complete it.

Barkley will be responsible for the coordination of prairie operations. The Konza is an 8,600-acre prairie that allows researchers to study the dynamics of the tall-grass prairie ecosystem, and it is one of 18 long-term ecological research laboratories across the country.

Barkley said 40 different groups, including NASA, research the prairie on a regular basis.

"We do basic research that stimulates a cascade effect that allows countless other researchers to utilize the information Konza Prairie researchers have obtained," Barkley said.

Barkley came to K-State from California in 1961 to begin his undergraduate studies. Since then he has written five books on plant life and is currently the curator of K-State's herbarium, which is a collection of dried plants used for botanical study.

Assisting Barkley as acting assistant coordinator will be David Harnett, associate professor of biology. Harnett came to K-State in 1986 and has been working with the prairie since his arrival.

Manhattan shoppers cautious about Christmas spending

Merchants say holiday season was still profitable

ERIN PERRY
Collegian

Manhattan-area Christmas shoppers were a bit hesitant to open their checkbooks and plunk down the plastic this season.

While daily reports of recession and rising unemployment figures have instilled caution in consumers, local merchants still characterized their Christmases as profitable.

"There was a lot of tension going on. They were spending money but didn't seem overjoyed about it," said Wade Whitmer, salesman at Krystallos, an accessories store specializing in exotic and New Age items.

While sales were ultimately good, he said, people seemed worried about letting go of their money, and a "Do I need it?" attitude prevailed.

Streetside Records manager Kay Harper said she noticed the same shopper behavior.

"People would pick up a single CD instead of buying the Led Zeppelin box set," Harper said.

The store, which is part of a Midwest chain based in St. Louis, did good business during Christmas, she said, but she had hoped to do a little better.

Stores in Manhattan Town Center witnessed slightly more energetic spending, but the bargains got the most attention.

K-G Men's Store manager Derek Miller said it was hard for him to believe there was a recession during Christmas, because his store was always busy.

However, his store offered sales on most merchandise throughout the season, some up to 50 percent off. Shoppers were "dollar conscious," he said, and scouting for sales.

Charlotte Hart, manager of the kitchen-goods shop Butterfields Etc., said her store's business was fair, but not as good as expected.

The slow start to the season was beginning to worry her staff when it finally began to pick up.

"It seemed to me people were holding off. They didn't seem to shop as early as usual," Hart said.

Customers also shied from Butterfields' big-ticket items, going with more modest purchases.

The store's biggest sales came just before and after Christmas, Hart said. In fact, she said, this month's sales so far have been better than a usual January.

Whitmer said the Christmas season, which traditionally begins in earnest the day after Thanksgiving, also started slow for Krystallos.

Talk of the recession put a nagging doubt in the store's buyers, but they gambled by putting a lot of money into merchandise without strong assurance it would all sell.

The risk paid off.

"We were scared at first, but once it started rolling, it was all we could do to keep up with it," Whitmer said.

He said that at first, shoppers looked around a lot and came in a number of times before making purchases — a strategy Whitmer termed "shopping reconnaissance."

Then, in the last couple of weeks before the holiday, shoppers nearly cleaned Krystallos out. Now, the store looks a little empty; Whitmer said they are restocking slowly because the first quarter is usually slow.

Retailers in Aggieville sometimes have to overcome the district's image as purely an entertainment mecca, said Cheryl Sieben, president of the Aggieville Business Association.

"People have a mindset that it's just a bar area, that it's just for students," Sieben said.

The ABA ran a promotion throughout the holiday season to bring in shoppers. Its highlight was a Christmas Showcase at the Ramada Inn, where people could see and taste products available in Aggieville.

Sieben said she didn't think many merchants let the doom-and-gloom portrait of the economy worry them. At best, Christmas business would be the peak of their season.

At worst, their business would merely remain consistent.

"The general mood was, 'It can only get better,'" Sieben said.

And conservatism was the shoppers' mood in most stores.

"People are being more careful with their dollar. They have to be," she said.

Harper said she thought it was the publicity about the recession, rather than direct effects such as unem-

Military investigates murder of woman

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

Military officials have concluded the equivalent of a Grand Jury Investigation in the slaying of Phillis Geiger, 19, whose body was found Nov. 17 at Fort Riley.

Sgt. 1st Class Edward Fierro, Company E/1st Engineering Batallion, was charged with premeditated murder in early December.

The murder is being investigated by the military since Gieger's body was found on the post.

Mark Meseke, Fort Riley media relations officer, said the post is working with the Geary County Sheriff's Office because Fierro allegedly assaulted Geiger at his Junction City apartment before dumping her body at Fort Riley.

Meseke said it appeared she was beaten to death, but the exact cause of death is not known yet.

Meseke also said it will be a week to 10 days before a recommendation is made on whether to court-martial Fierro, 39. He explained why it will take that long considering the "Grand Jury," Article 32 in military terms, has already concluded.

"The Article 32 needs to be typed up by a legal reporter. Once that gets done, the investigating officer will look at it and make a recommendation

TRADE WARS
OPERATION PACIFIC AUTO

■ American cars account for a little more than 16,000 of 5.1 million cars sold in Japan. Japanese auto makers have a one-third share of the American market.

EDITORIALS

"Buy American" won't sell in Japan

Nice move, George.

When President Bush made his "Buy American" pitch to Japan last week, he failed to do his homework.

"Buy American cars, or else," George demanded. For Bush, the Japanese reply could be summed up in the words of Keiko Shimizu, who was browsing through a Tokyo car showroom during Bush's speech.

"Now we feel very sorry for him," Shimizu said in the New York Times, "He's got so much pressure on his shoulders because of these economic problems. But my question is: Why don't the American people work harder and try to fit what they do into what other countries want to see?"

His point should be well taken, because American cars are sent to Japan with steering wheels on the wrong side. However, Detroit's big three think their cars will be gobbled up by Japanese consumers.

Most people have said they feel Japanese cars are built better than most American cars. Why, then, don't American car manufacturers try to make their products better?

Maybe it's because we ask Americans to buy American.

Sound odd? Think about it.

The "Buy American" campaign has been a success. People buy American goods, regardless of whether the product is inferior or not. Knowing that, what impetus would American manufacturers have to improve their product?

As students, we should be better consumers. Buy the best product, even if it's not American. Ironically, maybe that's the only way America can return to the top.

Consequences of war arrive one year later

It seemed like a good idea at the time.

One year ago today, K-State students responded to the start of Operation Desert Storm with mixed emotions.

Some were proud. Some were ashamed.

Most were scared.

But like a Rambo flick, U.S. troops quickly won a decisive victory, with few American casualties. Manhattan welcomed home Fort Riley troops with parades, ceremonies and used-car sales. We loved our troops like never before.

With celebration, however, came a local increase in domestic violence and divorce among military families. Manhattan residents are again kept awake by the continuing thunder of mortar shells to the west. K-State students complain about no longer having Aggieville to themselves.

On a national level, the billions of dollars spent on the war has helped disable an already struggling economy.

The Middle East is facing an environmental disaster many claim is our responsibility to repair. We have done little to help.

And the ultimate goal of Operation Desert Storm — peace — has yet to be achieved. Saddam Hussein is still the leader of Iraq. Kuwait is not the democratic nation we made it out to be.

So what's the point?

The people of the United States, especially the young, have learned a lesson they will pay for both financially and globally for the rest of their lives.

Rational, not emotional, consideration must be given to a conflict with the potential for war. Don't crave the quick thrill of victory, but take the time to establish long-term solutions.

Americans must take the responsibility of knowing what our government is doing, and we must make educated decisions to support or not support its intentions.

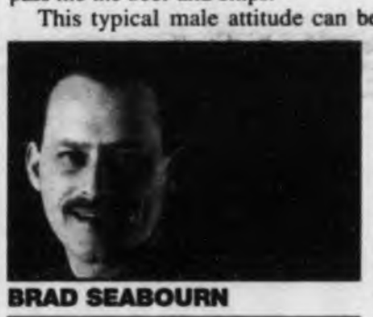
A YEAR WITHOUT RESOLUTION



I never make New Year's resolutions. It's not worth it. Life is complicated enough without the added burden of promises I know are doomed from the outset.

Oh, to be sure, a lot of people try each year, but the vast majority fail. Not because of lack of good intentions, mind you, but rather due to improper technique.

For instance, the most common resolution made at the beginning of each year is the "I-am-going-to-lose-some-weight" resolution. This is a resolution more common among lard-laden ladies than tubby men.

Most overweight men just say, "Screw it — pass me the beer and chips."

This typical male attitude can be accounted for — all single men know the male-to-female ratio is low, so why worry? And once men are married, the pressure is off to maintain peak performance for "the Hunt," so they lounge on the sidelines watching Monday Night Football, leisurely drinking and gorging with enough booze and pizza to bloat themselves across two time zones.

BRAD SEABOURN

However, it's all a matter of technique. The serious man in need of reducing his rotundity realizes the last thing you want to do is inform your stomach that the feed bag is about to be removed.

This alarming revelation brings on what is known as the "grab-the-refrigerator-and-run" syndrome. Its most aberrant manifestation is a head-long dive into an open refrigerator with mouth properly agape and both hands firmly planted on one's posterior.

Proper procedure in making this resolution work is to avoid making a declaration of war on fat and simply throw the evening meal out the door without warning. The dog will love you, and your stomach won't know what the hell happened. However, your wife (and now "former" cook) is another matter.

I have discovered it is my misfortune to be cursed with an involuntary reaction associated with wasted food that, having first tried this method, forced me to follow the food out the door and wrestle the dog for what was left of my dinner. My wife saw fit to beat this urge out of me with an as yet unidentifiable blunt object.

This brings me to another frequently asserted resolution this time of year — "I am not going to fight with my mate," which is an admirable resolution if I ever heard one. And one that is also doomed to failure, especially if attempted in conjunction with the previously mentioned procedure for losing weight.

I have attempted the "no-fight" resolution on numerous occasions, and have found it is impossible to uphold, especially if you are married to someone like my wife.

Just yesterday she asked, "Honey, will you please take out the trash?"

See what I mean? Always trying to pick a fight.

I said, "What do I look like, a garbage man?"

She said, "Of course not."

Even though I am packing a few extra pounds, and most of those garbage guys are overweight, I wasn't about to let her get away with that insult.

I quickly followed with, "Yeah, well your father likes to wear a grass skirt and dance to Hawaiian music."

I knew that would get her.

Ha! Her father is an electrician, and there is nothing an electrician's daughter hates worse than to be told her father wears grass skirts and dances to Hawaiian music.

Chalk one up for the chubby trash man.

Unfortunately, there is just no escaping degrading episodes like that. My wife has the most comprehensive list of "fightstarters" in five states.

Things like, "Honey, would you make sure your dirty underwear and socks make it into the hamper a little more often? I can't always pick them up for you in the evening."

Can you believe it?

Or how about, "Dear, please keep an eye on the kids while I mow the lawn and split some wood."? Now there's a real doozy.

This one will kill you: "Would you please back the car out of the garage so I can change the oil and rotate the tires?" Ha, Haaaaa!

Obviously, I have to put up with quite a bit.

"What is that dear? You just wanted to say you loved me?"

Oh, boy. Here we go again.

That's why I never make New Year's resolutions. With harping and badgering like that, who needs them?

That clothes thing

STEFFANY CARREL

Say, let's browse through my wardrobe for a moment, eh? Whadda treat — Steff's stuff.

OK. We'll start by standing right smack in the middle of my bedroom.

Look right ... left ... all around ... just kinda get your bearings. Comfortable?

All righty, here we go.

We should probably start at some reasonable beginning-like point. Hmmm ... what to do, what to do.

Of course, now that I look at it, I notice my room is rectangular. Rectangles don't tend to have any one specific starting or stopping point. They just kinda go around and around, pausing now and then at the corners.

To hold up matters even more, there doesn't seem to be any convenient signs with "This is GO — collect $200" printed on them.

Well, close your eyes and point. That always works.

Great. We've got a starting point. We're off.

The dresser. OK.

The corner next. Yep.

The big chair. Interesting.

The bed. Clothes there, too.

On to the closet. Simply fascinating.

And then back to the dresser.

Hmmm.

Whelp, Steff, we basically can ascertain that you prefer Levi's, earth tones and Birkenstocks. Other than that, it all looks alike. Quite honestly, after a while, one comfy pair of jeans looks startlingly like the pair crumpled next to it. And we can only count so high until your wool sock collection becomes rather redundant.

BRIAN W. KRATZER/Staff

"So, what's yer point, Steffaroo?"

Well, gang, it's just that I like what I wear — a whole bunch.

And I'm pretty darn sure that if all of us ventured into your bedroom and stood in the middle of your floor, we'd find that you also like your duds.

And for those of you who wear things you don't like — it's just about time you moved out of your mother's house. (Just a word of friendly advice, you know.)

Anyway, I base my whole argument on the assumption that the overwhelming majority of college students wear what we want to and like what we wear while we're wearing it.

"So, what's yer argument, Steffernini?"

Well, I'm glad you asked.

I'm concerned with a frightening prospect on my horizon. It's practically unavoidable. It catches up to almost everyone — and it may well be in your future, too.

The scariest, most horrific doom awaits us.

We must mobilize — become as one — band together against ... against ...

PROFESSIONAL CLOTHING!

Suits, high heels, ties, pantyhose — all of it.

We can't let it overcome our presently rational minds.

I mean, seriously, we could be the first generation of "young professionals" to reject the dress code. Stimulating, isn't it?"

Come on! Given the choice, no one in her right mind would pick polyester-blend suits and bone-crunching heels over soft, familiar denim and a comfy pair of tennies.

And those who would are simply anal retentive. They don't know any other way. It physically pains them to be within 10 yards of any breathable material. (And I bet you a million dollars they all, each and every one, voted for Georgy Porgy Bush. See where tight suits will get you? Recession. Yep.)

So join with me on this one.

You'll honestly like what you're wearing.

You'll be brilliantly productive on the job.

You'll avoid that anal retentive route and save us all a lot of problems Republicans tend to cause.

And, above all, you'll be incredibly comfortable.

So, when the nightmare of professional clothing threatens your life, remember what we were all raised to do. ...

Just say no.

GULF WAR

One year later, Iraq still threat

Saddam remains in power, intends to restore weapons capabilities

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Iraq clearly intends to restore its nuclear, chemical and biological weapons capability and can do so within a few years despite damage from the Persian Gulf War, CIA Director Robert Gates said today.

"Iraq will remain a primary proliferation threat at least as long as Saddam Hussein remains in power," Gates said at a hearing of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee examining weapons proliferation worldwide.

Despite damage from the war, the time needed to rebuild Iraq's nuclear weapons program is measured in a few, rather than many, years, Gates testified.

Chemical weapons capacity could be rebuilt in a year or so and biological weapons production could be restarted in a matter of weeks, he said.

To deliver the weapons, Iraq is believed to still have several hundred Scud missiles, Gates said, adding, "We're having some difficulty finding them."

Gates' testimony came a day before the first anniversary of the start of the U.S.-led war on Iraq, and in the midst of criticism of what had been the Bush administration's biggest foreign policy triumph.

While Gates said the Gulf War clearly damaged Iraq's weapons programs, his comments about how quickly they could be restored appeared to underscore criticism that the war had fallen short of achieving many U.S. goals.

Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind. and the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Middle East subcommittee, noted in a Public Broadcasting Service interview that Iran has regained its standing as a regional power, Arab states have failed to forge their own regional security regime, and Saudi Arabia and Kuwait have failed to make democratic reforms.

Halting the spread of mass-destruction weapons is America's new manifest destiny, said Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio.

"Our goal must be to work more closely with other nations to achieve not just a new world order, but a more peaceful world order." Glenn said.

Gates told the panel that the world continues to see a steady and worrisome growth in the proliferation of advanced weapons. More than 20 countries have, are suspected to have or are developing nuclear, chemical and biological arms and the means to deliver them, he said.

Only China and the former Soviet Union now have the ability to target missiles on U.S. territory, and the threat of similar abilities by third-world countries is at least a decade away, he said.

But the threat of shorter-range weapons is growing along a band from Libya through South Asia, he said. He mentioned China and North Korea as among the worst proliferator of nuclear and missile technology.

The republics of the former Soviet Union are maintaining effective control over their 30,000-warhead nuclear stockpile, he said.

Most Americans favor punishment, see striking again as option

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Two-thirds of Americans surveyed in an Associated Press poll said the United States should strike Iraq militarily once again if it continues to secretly develop nuclear weapons.

One year after Iraqi President Saddam Hussein refused to give in to international pressure to withdraw forces from Kuwait, he remains a formidable villain in the eyes of most Americans, the poll found.

The uncovering of his nuclear program after the war has left Americans suspicious and unsympathetic.

A 61 percent majority said the United Nations should continue to punish Iraq by cutting off trade until Iraq proves it has halted nuclear weapons development. Only 26 percent agreed with an alternative opinion that the trade embargo must stop because it makes innocent Iraqi civilians suffer.

The telephone poll of 1,004 adults was taken Jan. 2-5 by ICR Survey Research Group of Media, Pa. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The poll found 65 percent approval for President Bush's decision to go to war a year ago. This approval rate was down from 74 percent a week after the war began, and 73 percent six months after the bombing began.

However, the disapproval rate, 25 percent, has not risen significantly. Approval dropped because more people said they don't know their position or refused to answer the question.

If high approval continues this election year, Bush could benefit politically, especially among men, who are about a third more likely than women to back the decision to go to war. But the poll also shows weak spots in the public's approval.

About two-thirds of those surveyed said the United States should have continued fighting to force Saddam from power. Just as in an AP poll six months ago, less than a fourth of Americans agree with Bush's decision to stop short of overthrowing the Iraqi president.

Most Republicans polled wanted Saddam ousted, but 71 percent of Republicans still rated the U.S. military effort as successful. A slim majority of both Democrats and independents said the war was only somewhat successful or not at all successful.

Overall among Americans, 16 percent said the U.S. military effort was completely successful, 36 percent said it was mostly successful, 36 percent said it was only somewhat successful and 9 percent said it was not at all successful.

After Bush halted combat last Feb. 27, Americans were treated to a succession of memorable scenes of U.S. victory. They included the Iraqi acceptance of U.N. cease-fire conditions, Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf's triumphant briefing, the return of Kuwait to its people and homecoming parades for American troops.

Yet those images were interspersed with disturbing pictures of starving Kurds, Kuwaiti brutality toward Iraqi sympathizers and Saddam's persistent militarism. U.N. nuclear inspectors last summer were met with resistance and even gunfire in Iraq before that nation agreed to have its equipment monitored.

Iraq has continuously rejected a U.N. plan to sell oil worth $1.6 billion to buy food and medicines. Iraq contends the plan violates its sovereignty and independence, but the Bush administration insists Iraq must accept it unconditionally.

The trade embargo, even at the cost of having Iraqi civilians suffer, has majority support among both Democrats and Republicans, the poll found.

ployment, that resulted in conservative spending in this area.

Merchants say strong consumer support from students and soldiers has kept them in steady business while other parts of the country suffer more of the recessionary bite.

Lloyd Thomas, professor of economics, said this recession, which began in July 1990, differs from the one in 1982 caused by restrictive Federal Reserve policies designed to pull money out of the economy.

"This one is caused by a decline of consumer confidence," Thomas said.

Today, he said, people see the government doing nothing to effectively combat the budget deficit. They fear for their jobs and are in debt as well.

to the commanding general.

"It will pass through a staff judge advocate, brigade commander and then the commanding general. If the commanding general agrees with the recommendation, the case will go to a general court-martial trial," he said.

Meseke said the trial would most likely begin in late February.

But if it is recommended not to go to a general court-martial, other options that may be pursued include dismissing the case or an Article 15. An Article 15 is a field court-martial, with less severe punishments than the Article 32. The death penalty is an option with an Article 32.

Geiger's immediate family lives in El Paso, Texas, but she had been living in Junction City with relatives since late June 1991.

TENNIS

Netters nationally ranked

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

For K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau, Christmas was a wonderful time. He got away from the tennis business, spent time with the family and received a nice present to boot.

For the first time in school history, Bietau's Cat netters received votes in the Volvo Tennis National Collegiate Rankings. In the individual rankings, which came out along with the team rankings Dec. 10, Yugoslavian freshman Karin Lusnic is ranked 49th.

Bietau said the rankings were a pleasant surprise.

"I feel very good about the recognition," he said. "It's a nice affirmation to get a recognition from outside. I was a little surprised with the team rank, because we haven't proven ourselves on a consistent basis at that level. But I expected Karin to move into the ranks."

In the Central Region rankings, K-State is tied for fourth with Utah. In the individual regional rankings, Lusnic is fourth, sophomore Michèle Riniker is sixth, and Swiss freshman Mareke Plocher ranked 15th.

The doubles teams of Lusnic and Plocher, and Neili Wilcox and Riniker are ranked fourth and 10th, respectively, in the region.

Bietau said being ranked will help somewhat in recruiting since players look for the top teams, but it doesn't go far beyond that.

"I don't worry about it too much," he said. "I felt we did the right things here at K-State for quite a while. The team had a high expectation to start with. The fact we've got recognized won't change it.

"Players like Mareke Plocher, who really knows the game, aren't going to let the rankings affect them. And I think that is a wise course to follow."

It also won't affect the other teams in the Big Eight conference in how they look at K-State, Bietau said. The team won't have more pressure on its shoulders.

"The teams that are familiar with our team and what we're doing — this fall, in particular — know we have a good team," he said. "Maybe seeing this on paper is going to alert teams that knew us from last year and haven't seen us since that we've done something since then."

With Lusnic in the rankings, the question about who's No. 1 in the team is almost solved by itself.

"I'd say the deal is not done yet," Bietau said. "Karin played very well at the right time. Mareke played well the entire fall; her few losses were very competitive ones. And Michèle moved up a level at the regional championships. But I think you have to give Karin the edge to be No. 1."

For Lusnic, the rankings were news that makes her smile.

CATS BASKETBALL

Inside punch propels Cats past Shockers

Howard, Collier lead five Cats in double figures

PATRICK OBLEY
Collegian

Coming into Wednesday's game, K-State had never lost to Wichita State in Manhattan. After about three minutes elapsed in the 20th meeting of the Sunflower rivals, one could see why.

At that juncture, post man Aaron Collier's stick-back of an errant shot gave the Cats an 8-0 lead en route to a 72-50 win.

However, K-State's eighth win in 12 tries didn't really come that easy. By the 9:51 mark of the first half, the Shockers led 14-12.

Confused? Well, don't worry. Coming into the game, both teams were known for missing the point on the floor. The Shockers were shooting 30 percent from the field to the Cats' 45 percent.

Tonight was no exception. At the half, the Cats led 32-22 thanks in part to WSU's brick-laying 26 percent shooting.

"Both teams were a little sluggish offensively," Cats coach Dana Altman said. "I think they missed some easy shots. I'm sure Wichita State has some shots they wanted to take back."

"We definitely took shots tonight that we wouldn't have taken if we had this game all over," Shocks' coach Mike Cohen said. "I think we took some good shots. We just missed some of the easy ones."

The Cats expanded their lead throughout the second half and were never seriously threatened.

Collier and Wylie Howard continued to sparkle inside, combining for 28 points and 24 rebounds. Howard cleaned the boards on the defensive end, grabbing 10 of his 14 rebounds in the Shocker's paint. Meanwhile seven of Colliers 10 rebounds were wiped off the offensive end, most of those resulting in stick-backs.

"Wylie Howard has provided stability for us inside," Altman said. "Wylie got some great defensive boards while Aaron went after some offensive boards very aggressively."

Cohen agreed with Altman and said the two big Cats were what broke his team's back.

"Wylie is a tremendous leader for that team," Cohen said. "K-State grabbed 25 offensive boards and that's what did us in. That's where Collier got his points."

Collier and Howard attributed their play to the performance of the team as the game wore on.

"We were more loose and more comfortable and could do more things than we could earlier," Collier said. "We were shaken at times, but settled down nicely and came out and played hard."

"I think we got great effort from everyone," Howard said. "When everybody puts out effort, it's easier for myself or Aaron to score."

On paper, the Cats hit only three shots more than 2-9 Wichita. As it developed, the margin of victory was attained at the (gasp) charity stripe.

The Cats, who previously shot just 64 percent from the line during the year, hit 23 of 31 charities for 74 percent Wednesday. The biggest contributor at the line was Howard, who converted nine of 11 attempts.

Five Cats hit double figures for the game. Beside Howard and Collier, Gaylon Nickerson scored 16 points. Trasel Rone had 13, and Ski Jones had 12.

Altman said he believed the Cats' win would be a good confidence builder heading into the Oklahoma game Saturday.

Wildcats' center Wylie Howard falls away from Wichita State center John Smith after being fouled by Smith while attempting a dunk in the first half of the game Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum. The Cats defeated the Shockers 72-50.

"We got the chance to work on a few things," Altman said. "We still have a little room for improvement both offensively and defensively, but yeah, I do think we're making progress, and we'll be better prepared for Oklahoma than we were two weeks ago."

The win was particularly sweet for Nickerson, who played for the Shockers during the 1989-90 season.

"Yeah, it was a little sweet," Nickerson said. "I wanted to come out and play as well tonight as I had wanted to against Edwardsville last week."

INSIDE STUFF

Rone regains shooting touch

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Rip up the missing persons report. Trasel Rone has resurfaced.

The 6-foot-6 junior transfer had played a big role in the first five contests of the year for the Cats, four of which were victories.

But since scoring 19 points in a 99-81 Cat win over Alabama State on Dec. 14, Rone, who was averaging 15 tallies an outing at that point, seemingly had taken an extended offensive vacation.

He's back.

"Trasel Rone can score," K-State Coach Dana Altman said of his swingman, who had 13 points in 18 minutes of play as the Cats downed Wichita State 72-50. "He's struggled at times, but he's practiced harder the last two or three weeks.

"I'm pleased with that."

The work in practice would appear to have paid off, along with a philosophical adjustment made by Rone, who had lived and died behind the 3-point line.

"I told myself after the last game that I was going to stop shooting the three so much," Rone said. "I wanted to look to the middle and concentrate on getting something done in there, and then go back outside."

Rone's first bucket against the Shockers came from four feet inside of the arc, a jumper from the right of the circle with just under three minutes left in the opening half.

Then, with time running down in the initial 20 minutes, Rone put up a jumper from the left baseline, only to see it come up short.

Instead of standing around as someone else went to the glass, Rone took his pregame plan to heart, racing past a pair of WSU defenders to grab the rebound and put the ball in the hole with just one second showing.

He left the court dealing out high fives and pumping his fists. That was the first indication that the "old" Rone might have been in attendance.

"It was just a matter of time," Rone said of his return to double figures and a sense of offensive confidence. "I knew I wasn't going to struggle forever."

That became fairly obvious in the second half, as Rone put together an offensive flurry over a span of just under five minutes that had most of the 8,569 in attendance convinced that he had, indeed, come to play.

With K-State up just 42-31, Rone initiated his onslaught.

First came a 15-footer from the free throw circle with 13:52 left. That was followed by a 21-foot, 3-pointer from the far corner of the baseline.

Four foul shots ended the run. The score at the end of Rone's Run was 55-37. An 11-point lead had swelled to 18, with just 9:06 left.

For Rone, the offensive success was nothing more than a matter of simple execution.

"The offense is set up where the shots are always there," he said. "It's just a matter of getting them down."

Another thing Rone was worried about getting down following the contest was his number of turnovers.

He had five, most of them late, and was aware of the number as reporters quizzed him in the postgame press conference. He held up five fingers and smiled before the question had even been completed.

"One of the assistant coaches has already talked to me about it," he said. "Toward the end of the game, I think I just didn't stay focused and let a couple of balls get away from me.

"That's kind of upsetting."

But that may have been all that upset Rone on this night, the night he let a few folks know that he hadn't ever gone away.

SPORTS COLUMN

Dart: Three strikes against NBC's sports programming

MARGO KELLER

The same company that claims to bring good things to life has brought some bad sports programming to television. The Sports department at NBC, owned by none other than General Electric Co., while televising an array of colorful sports programming, stills needs to rethink some of its latest special programs.

Not to ruffle too many peacock feathers, but a triad of NBC sports specials might have looked better on the editing floor or off the air altogether.

For instance the November special program dubed "Jock Spots" is a behind-the-scenes look at the making of five commercials with athletes including Jimmy Connors and Michael Jordan peddling wares for big-name companies. Viewers have the opportunity to see what goes into the making of a 30-second commerical within the hour program. So the show cuts to a commercial break and low and behold the same commercial we just saw being produced is finished and on the air. What a coincidence, or is it?

NBC Sports VP Jonathan Miller, in the Wall Street Journal, cited "new and different ways of doing business" included approaching advertisers first and promising them the program would feature their commercial.

Companies who evidently don't realize the distinction of television programming and advertising were enticed by NBC's offer. Bristol-Myers Squibb's Nuprin, Upper Deck, Coca-Cola, Hanes, and Nike were all awarded an extra dose of advertising. Similar to the questionable "advertorial," advertising disguised as actual editorial pages, in magazines and long-extended commercials called "infomercials," the program gives another example where advertising and editorial are an unfortunate catalyst.

Miller was reported to be considering another installment of the special program. That is, if they can schedule it around the multitude of Notre Dame games and aTripleCast of the Summer Olympics.

While it covers the Orange Bowl and other collegiate games, NBC has signed an exclusive agreement with Notre Dame to give them the national coverage in a five-year contract valued at more than $38 million.

While included among College Football Association's 64 teams, which also includes the Big Eight football teams, Notre Dame ditched the CFA's contract with ABC and ESPN to make the deal.

When Notre Dame left CFA for NBC, each collegiate team in the CFA contract lost a collective $150,000 over five years, said Kansas University's Athletic Director Bob Frederick.

Notre Dame as of yet hasn't turned into a corporation, but at the whim of NBC, the green and gold could be as prevalent as a regularly scheduled sitcom.

NBC Sports has blessed TV land with not only the Fighting Irish, but an overkill of Summer Olympics. NBC will broadcast 161 free hours within 16 days, but has an agreement with Cablevision for providing 3 cable channels 24-hours a day of Olympics a day with a mega 1,080 hours of programming at $95 to $170 a hookup, according to Sports Illustrated's Norman Chad.

Won't people be just a little fatigued of the triad of Winter Olympic coverage and Olympic commercials bombarding the airwaves? Perhaps there are true-blue fans that want 24-hour coverage so they can wake up at 3 or 4 a.m. and get exercise by zapping back and forth between three channels that are replaying the long-distance track preliminaries.

If the TripleCast entices the Olympics fans, who will watch normal NBC Sports coverage? Maybe airing "Jock Shots" and Notre Dame games has already remedied that problem. Then again, remote control makes switching the channel effortless.

LADY CATS BASKETBALL

Controversy overshadows effort in loss

Charging call on Miller thwarts big Lady Cat comeback in conference opener

ERIC BROWN
Collegian

"You make the call."

That's all a momentarily speechless Coach Susan Yow could say Tuesday night.

A controversial charging foul on Mary Jo Miller in the closing second was the margin of difference when Yow's Lady Cats opened Big Eight play with a 74-73 loss to Oklahoma State in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State, which had trailed since the opening minutes — at one time late in the first half by 19 — was on the verge of finishing off an amazing comeback. The Lady Cats got the scenario they wanted, only to see it vanish as quick as a whistle.

The Cowgirls had the ball and a 1-point lead, 74-73, after a steal and Miller layup with 35 seconds to play. K-State, choosing not to foul, came up with a steal by Lynn Holzman with four seconds left. Holzman found Miller at the half-court line with an outlet pass, and Miller had one defender to beat.

That defender was freshman Leslie Day. Day raced Miller to the basket with Miller determined to go all the way to the hole. The ball fell off the rim, and heavy contact drew a whistle with only 0.3 seconds showing on the clock.

"I guarantee if that official went back and looked at that call, he would know he missed it, because you have to have position," Yow said. "It would be different if she (Day) had had position and Mary Jo had lowered her shoulder and gone into her. It wasn't like that; she never had position, and the defense always has to have position."

The controversial outcome overshadowed, as Yow said, a "tremendous" team effort for the Lady Cats, now 3-11 and 0-1 in Big Eight play.

"This was one of the greatest games we've played in the two years I've been here," Yow said. "This is the best team effort of any of the teams I've coached at K-State. We came out ready to play tonight, and we were cohesive. This is definitely something we can build on."

"It's really upsetting," said Holzman, who led four Lady Cats in double figures with 16 points. "We've come so far in such a long time, and it seems like everything will be going our way and then one thing will decide it."

With the game deadlocked at 9-9 with 16:51 left in the first half, Oklahoma State went on a 24-5 run over the next 10:44. During that stretch, the Lady Cats were scoreless for more than five minutes.

But K-State wouldn't be denied. A Miller layup and a Kelly Moylan 3-pointer with five seconds left in the half cut the lead to nine, 42-33.

The second half started out like the first half ended, as Miller and Gretchen Bertrand tossed in treys to narrow the margin to three at 42-39.

Once again the Lady Cats showed courage and battled back with a 12-2 run that got K-State within one 67-66 at the 5:26 mark.

"We did a great job rebounding and executing," Yow said. "Things really started to gel tonight and we just played smarter."

In addition to Holzman's 16, Leah Honeycutt had 13, Miller had 11 and Jennifer Grebing scored 10. Pam Stoltz and Moylan both added 9.

Lisa McGill threw in 28 points, mostly on the inside, to lead the Cowgirls.

Transfer, suspensions bring scrutiny to program

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

And the beat goes on.

K-State's women's basketball team, which has been surrounded by controversy since December 1989, was again the topic of heated discussion during the early portion of semester break.

Yow

A pair of decisions by Coach Susan Yow — to dismiss three players from the squad and to allow Kodak junior college all-American Jaime White to transfer — were announced Dec. 16.

The three players Yow suspended were all freshmen. Nicole Brown and Michelle Johnson came to K-State from Midwest City, Okla. The third player dismissed, Joey Ward, was reinstated by Yow within 24 hours of the initial suspension.

Yow insisted that each of the players involved had not fallen from grace, in her eyes, as individuals.

"It has nothing to do with any of them as individuals," Yow said Dec. 20. "It's really not a cut on any of the girls at all."

But Yow was not as kind when it came to assessing the on-court behavior, or lack of "proper" behavior, that led to the drastic roster shakeup.

White, who came to K-State from Utah Valley Community College in Orem, Utah, was overwhelmed by the transition to major college basketball and was virtually a one-dimensional player, Yow said.

"When she stepped on our practice floor," Yow said of White, "she looked around, and she saw she wasn't any better than Kelly Moylan. She had a hard time dealing with that at first."

A comparison of a community college star with Moylan, who prior to a strong start this year had averaged only 1.1 points per game in her first two seasons in Manhattan, would appear at first to be somewhat of a stretch, but not after what White and Yow saw, the second-year Lady Cat coach said.

"We were asking her to play both ends of the floor," Yow said. "And playing defense was a difficult transition for her. Defense is one of the simple things to teach, and yet not everyone gets a handle on it.

"The thing about defense that is different than offense is that it is all-out work. We weren't getting that."

One thing Yow and White both got during the tough time prior to White's decision to transfer was help from an outside source.

"We went as far as seeing a sports psychologist," Yow said. "She met with him, and I did, too. He really helped both of us.

She said the psychologist was so truthful in what he told her and White that they both concluded that White should transfer.

Yow said she and her staff were convinced they got a good one when they signed White.

"That's exactly the perception we had. We were proud to be able to say that we got an all-American," Yow said. "Here she was, after all, a juco all-American. We thought she would come here and help us right away.

"But her fear of failure and the fact she put so much pressure on herself to be perfect was a killer."

What hurt the trio of players suspended, more than anything else, Yow said, was attitude.

"You'd have to be at practice every day, have to be in a position to evaluate the players every game," Yow said. "And when we began to make assessments, we felt as though those three ladies were struggling with certain concepts.

"Everything we were doing with them was directed at behavior. We had several conversations about their outlook on practice and outlook on playing time and games, and we never felt like the situation got any better.

"I felt like their performance was getting worse game by game and took measures to help rectify the situation."

Ward was back seemingly as quickly as she was gone.

"Really, Joey Ward was never really gone," Yow said. "She apologized for her behavior and understood that it hasn't been positive. She really wanted to play basketball at Kansas State."

Ward responded to her reinstatement by having her best game of the year on the Saturday following the move. She scored 9 points and had six rebounds in a home loss to Wisconsin-Green Bay.

Brown and Johnson have not returned to the squad, but have enrolled for the spring semester and were in attendance at the game against Oklahoma State Tuesday night.

The moves involving the four players were the latest in a rather bizarre string of circumstances the program has seen in the past two-plus years.

Yow replaced interim coach Gaye Griffin — who had replaced Matilda Mossman at mid-season in 1989-90 — as the Lady Cat head coach prior to the start of the 1990-91 season.

During her first season in Manhattan, Yow was open in her criticism of some of her players with the press, and that led to an uneasy situation at year's end. At the conclusion of the '90-'91 campaign, both Mary Jo Miller and Leah Honeycutt were dismissed from the team by Yow amidst a storm of controversy.

Both have since returned and comprise two-fifths of the team's starting unit. K-State has been forced into a 10-player rotation because of the most recent roster moves and Yow's decision to stick to her plan to redshirt Dana Pollock.

Riley County Landfill closes

County's trash finds home in Douglas County

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

After years of proposals and mountains of paperwork, Riley County trash finally has a home in Douglas County.

The Riley County Landfill closed Dec. 31, 1991, and area trash is now being transported to the N.R. Hamm Quarry, four miles northwest of Lawrence.

The landfill was closed because of hazardous chemical leakage into the water table alongside the landfill seven years ago. The landfill was originally supposed to have closed by June 30, 1990, but the county obtained two extensions to allow work to be done on a proposed regional landfill.

"It takes a while to get paperwork done, and we were trying to find the best location for the landfill, which ended up being at the Walker Stone Quarry," County Commissioner Richard Jepson said.

The Walker Quarry, located in Dickinson County, will not be open for a couple years while the site is being developed, Jepson said.

In the meantime, the trash is being taken to a temporary transfer station at the Riley County Landfill, where it is then transferred to the Hamm Quarry and buried.

"Ecologically speaking, the Hamm's site is good because it has good environmental protection. The land around there is impermeable shale," Jepson said. "Also, this way we don't have half of Riley County fighting with the other half because nobody wants the landfill."

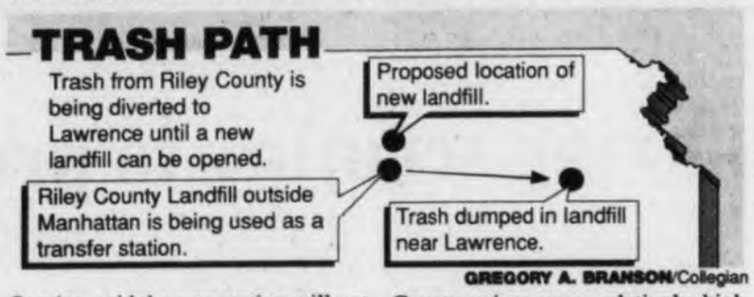
Danny Zinn, driver for Hamm Quarries, Perry, Kan., pushes trash into a chute at a transfer station in the Riley County Landfill. The station was created after the landfill was declared an environmental threat.

Some Manhattan trash companies may be forced to increase collection prices because of the new rules for the transfer station. The station no longer accepts compost — such as tree limbs and grass clippings — mixed with the trash.

"We'll probably have to take all the trash separately. That'll probably end up being a major cost," Damian Schmidt, Arrow Trash Service, said.

"The thing I'm hoping is that people will stop throwing their stuff away. I hope they'll start compost piles at home," he said.



Diane Brummett, B&L Trash Service, said the new station will not affect her company's prices, because B&L already separates compost from regular garbage.

"Transporting to Lawrence would actually be cheaper," she said. "It's $3 to $4 less per cubic yard."

Brummett said this is because Riley County prices were relatively high due to costs of surveying and taking care of the water contamination. Prices will not be lowered, however, because the money saved will be used for a recycling program proposed by the Riley County Solid Waste Management Committee.

Store owners call Aggieville place to be, for now

STEPHANIE FUQUA
Collegian

New businesses are cropping up like weeds in Aggieville, which leads some Manhattan store owners to claim that Aggieville is the hot property of the 1990s.

Although Amigo's and the Earth Store bottomed out, five or six businesses have started up, and several old businesses have expanded during the past six months.

One such store that has expanded for the second time is the Dusty Bookshelf. It opened in 1985 and moved during August 1991 to the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Moro Street.

Diane Meredith, owner of Dusty Bookshelf, said business has been booming.

"It's been incredible being on this corner. There's a lot more people walking by," she said. "I wouldn't want to be anywhere else. It's a different kind of store, and Aggieville is the place for a different kind of store."

Cheryl Sieben, executive director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Aggieville is the place to be.

"It's affordable, and it's where the action seems to be right now," she said. "Being located near campus is a bonus, because we get all the foot traffic other districts don't get."

Kay Harper, manager of Streetside Records, agreed.

"We feel like Aggieville, with the proximity to the campus, is excellent," she said.

Although business seems to be booming, Sieben said, it probably won't last forever.

"It cycles. Sometimes we may have several businesses go out at one time, and we're like, 'What happened?'" she said.

But for now, Sieben said, retail stores are strong and Aggieville offers a successful variety of entertainment. She also said Aggieville looks better than ever after the recent renovations.

ASK

Erin Burke, junior in public relations and assistant to Persinger on ASK, said other regents representatives probably reacted the only way they could.

"She meant right, but she didn't go about it the right way in trying to persuade them," she said.

Burke also said she thought the other schools felt bullied into accepting an ultimatum.

To resolve the prioritization discrepancy among ASK regents representatives, the issues at stake were drawn out of a hat and placed on the list in no particular order. Capital improvements was drawn first and placed first on the list. McClaskey said she was satisfied with the results.

Persinger said everything proceeded smoothly at the meeting after the prioritization debate was concluded and the list had been compiled.

According to the Student Government Services Office, ASK has been representing students from K-State in the state Legislature since 1973. By pooling resources, the schools and students have a much larger lobbying voice in Topeka than any one institution could have.

ASK accomplishments include the Margin of Excellence request, a youth education service for college-bound students, the Higher Education Loan Program, which loans money to needy students, and a Student Advisory Committee composed of student body presidents who represent student concerns to the regents.

War Stories

there. He went downstairs a couple of times to go for a run, to keep the edge off.

They were supposed to have moved to the assembling area in the desert five days after they arrived at the Kobhar Towers, but that was moved further and further down the schedule while the Air Force pounded Baghdad in January. Not many of the guys minded, though — there was running water in Kobhar Towers.

Late January. They all moved out to Pathline Road, a staging area. Bass left a few days before Eskildsen did — Bass was with Brigade Plans, and Eskildsen was a personnel staff NCO.

The desert looked to Eskildsen like an ocean cove with the tide out. Maybe just over the rise there's water, a tree, something. But there were just the occasional flights overhead. The radio piped in news from the BBC that then Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev was trying to talk with the Iraqis, and the Iraqis were saying they would pull out if the Americans would stop the bombing, the pounding. Some of the soldiers began to get hopeful.

"Don't even listen to the radio," Eskildsen's commander said. "Two days. We're going. We're going."

A lot of Eskildsen's soldiers wrote home that night.

The day it happened, Eskildsen loaded up on supplies and ammunition for his men and the rest of the battalion — enough to last three days. Bass was further behind getting the battle orders from the channels and coming up with their own little piece of the pie. The forward support elements were ahead of them both. And the front line was 15 to 20 clicks ahead.

Eskildsen could see the fight better at night. He stood on top of his truck and watched the Iraqis stumbling around, seeing just past their noses in the dark as the ground forces literally ran over them. He thought to himself how wild it was. He watched a tank trying to get away in such a hurry that it drove over another live Iraqi tank and stuck itself there. An American blew them both away.

Bass couldn't see the fight — he was that far back. Sometimes over the radio he could hear what was going on. No artillery came near him or his unit. Moving at more than 20 mph past the wreckage of Iraqi tanks and the charred bodies, Bass felt secure and safe, and Eskildsen thought for sure they had crossed the Turkish border.

Eskildsen worried that by leaving so much behind they might be making a mistake. But none of the Iraqis wanted to fight. The soldiers left their massive supples of ammunition behind to fill their empty stomachs. They ran to the truck, climbing on it at times. Eskildsen's men threw them food and pointed them south.

Then, sooner than it began, it was over.

Some of the POWs that came up to Bass said they didn't even know the Americans were coming. They were skinny, some with only one thong or one boot. Back at some of the holding areas, Bass had heard that Iraqis would hit the ground — screaming and crawling — when a plane or helicopter would fly over the Iraqis would hit the ground.

Along the battlefield, Bass never saw a bunker with food or water in it, though there were plenty with ammo and missiles and light armor and AK-47s. Bass drove by hundreds of smoking tanks and bodies like scenes from Mad Max. Finally, his unit set up just south of Kuwait on what someone laughingly called the "Highway of Death."

Eskildsen rolled through the same six-lane road the day after the cease-fire. It reminded him of how Stephen King would write a holocaust scene. The Americans were given orders during the air war to destroy everything that was going north on the highway.

Eskildsen guessed the Iraqis must have thought if they took civilian-owned vehicles they wouldn't be harmed, but the entire road was littered with blown up cars and trucks: Cougars, Mercedes Benzes, BMWs, trucks, everything. Eskildsen pulled up on top of the road, and there was nothing alive as far as he could see both ways — just TV sets, clothes, bodies, suitcases. There was a 50-foot burned crater where an ammo truck had been. The melted piece of the engine block was sitting ahead of the crater a few feet. "Whoosh," Eskildsen thought.

Bass and his unit shuffled in and out and back and forth over the Iraqi border. His unit kept getting moved all around, and Bass got tired of that real quick. If they were going on to get rid of Saddam Hussein, he wanted it done. His wife and daughter were waiting at home.

At night, Eskildsen turned over in his bunk, because the light from the oil fires miles away in Kuwait were too bright. Most of the time, he thought they were pretty, and pretty weird when the wind shifted, turning daylight to dusk. Kansas seemed a long way away, and he thought about how he never thought he was going to die out there.

Back at Kobhar Towers, Bass spent two days washing vehicles while he heard other soldiers leaving. The Army getting out of Saudi was like getting in — the people up high kept changing their minds and the departure dates. Bass would be sure he was leaving in the next two or three days, then it would be moved back. He waited until the night before he was for sure, for sure, for sure leaving to call his wife. He spent the hours walking around the compound with his Walkman that spring evening. He couldn't sleep; he was too happy.

The plane kept Bass awake. It flew past New York, and the pilot requested a flyby over the Statue of Liberty. Eskildsen only caught a glimpse of it, and he was a little worried because the plane was flying so low. When the plane landed at a stopover in Maine, Bass refused to get off. He wanted to stay on the plane, sleep and hope it would take off again soon.

"Sir, you need to get off the plane so we can clean it," a blonde stewardess said.

Bass told her to clean around him.

"It's going to be at least two hours before we take off again," she said.

Bass said he would sleep through it.

"Please, sir...," she said.

He got up and reluctantly walked off the plane into a surprise celebration the airline had planned for the soldiers. A band played, food was served, and a parade marched through the celebration.

Eskildsen and Bass arrived in Topeka at the same time May 7. No one was there to greet them, as per the Army's orders. Only a 50-mile bus ride from home. There'd be a reception for them there.

Eskildsen could hear the band playing from the other hangar at Marshall Army Airfield in Fort Riley. The 1/16th checked in equipment and weapons, then moved to the reception hangar.

They marched in time to a drum cadence. Flags were flying, and the Army wives were singing. Bass smiled. He was home.

The first couple of months were pretty good. The equipment wasn't back, and Bass took a couple weeks leave to drive around to visit relatives and to go different places and see different things.

Eskildsen picked up his daughter and got the impression from his mother that she, like so many Americans, had been imprisoned by her television while he was gone. Though she never watched the news — ever — she couldn't get out of the chair or the house during the war.

But duty called, and Eskildsen and Bass came back to work at Fort Riley. They both wonder now if they should have gone on into Iraq and got rid of Hussein. They wonder the future of the U.S. armed forces now that the Cold War is over.

The death of Hussein at the hands of the Americans would have made things worse, Eskildsen said. The best way to solve the problems in the Middle East, he said, would be to separate church and state, like the Americans have. Then an Iraqi should Bass's mind changes from day to day. He said he sat over in the desert thinking to himself, "What are we waiting on? Let's take this guy out and go home." He said he personally thinks he wouldn't have stopped if he was sitting where the higher-ups were.

The future of the Army is uncertain to them both. Eskildsen said he thinks it's smart to scale down since there's no major threat now. A scaled-down defense would allow some money to be spent on some problems at home.

Bass said though it looks like things are going to change, they probably won't.

If the government does scale down the forces, he said, he hopes they will be able to fight as well as they did in Iraq. He said he sees a lot of soldiers being cut — a lot of good soldiers.

You can't judge a soldier just by a test score, he said. He knows, because he fought alongside them.

Prostitute shot man for power, prosecutor says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DELAND, Fla. — An admitted prostitute who told of killing seven men who picked her up along Florida roadways repeatedly shot one victim out of a need to feel power over men, a prosecutor said today.

The defense countered that Aileen Wuornos killed businessman Richard Mallory in self-defense because he subjected her to hideous abuse.

In opening statements in the first of five murder cases brought against her, State Attorney John Tanner contended that she shot Mallory four times "because she didn't want to leave a witness."

"She liked control ... tremendous power. ... She'd been controlling men for years, and she took everything Richard Mallory had, including his life," Tanner told jurors.

Wuornos, 35, was charged with first-degree murder in the death of Mallory, 51, whose decomposed body was found near Ormond Beach, north of Daytona Beach, in December 1989. Mallory owned an electronics repair shop in Clearwater.

Prosecutors said they will seek the death penalty if she is convicted. Although Florida has never executed a woman, there are three women on death row.

Investigators say Wuornos went on a 13-month killing spree of men, and have described her as the nation's first female serial killer to be brought to trial.

Wuornos has been jailed since her arrest in January 1991.

Authorities say Wuornos confessed in a lengthy videotaped statement to killing seven men. As yet, she is charge in five of the deaths.

Assistant Public Defender Tricia Jenkins said Wuornos shot Mallory in self-defense after accepting a ride from near Tampa to Daytona Beach.

"Mallory was inflicting abuse. He wanted to see her pain," Jenkins said, telling the jury they would "hear evidence of bondage, rape, sodomy and degradation."

"Lee Wuornos is not guilty," Jenkins said. "She defended herself. She had had enough. She could take it not one more time."

Wuornos, a heavy user of drugs and alcohol, contends in the videotaped statement that she killed the men in self-defense. Some were first wounded and then shot repeatedly so they wouldn't be able to identify her, she admitted.

The presiding judge, Circuit Judge Uriel Blount, said he hoped the trial would be finished in a couple of weeks.

Along with the first-degree murder charge, Wuornos is charged with felony murder — robbery with a weapon resulting in death. Both charges carry possible death penalties.

Trial dates in the other four slayings in which Wuornos is charged have not been set.

CAMPUS

Center provides orientation, help for international students

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

Some of the registration and enrollment processes are confusing for new K-State students, particularly new international students.

The International Student Center provides an orientation meeting before each semester for new international students.

"When students come here for the first time, everything seems strange to them," said Motaz Hourani, graduate assistant at the International Student Center. "They're easily scared and don't know what they have to do."

Hourani said one benefit of the orientation is that the students find other international students who have been at K-State for some time and have gone through the same feelings of disorientation.

About 100 new students were told how to register and enroll at K-State during orientation Jan. 10. They were given information about the Graduate School and about recent changes in visa regulations and immigration rules in the United States.

"We are helping the students contact their adviser, to find the student's department and the right classes for them. We also inform them about financial aid," Hourani said.

But the help of the International Student Center and other volunteers doesn't stop with information about school procedures. Hourani said the help starts before the orientation.

"We help them as far as picking the students up from the airport and giving them information about housing, on and off campus," he said.

"Besides that, we tell them about Manhattan, American culture and campus activities. Altogether, it is a combination of technical, class-oriented information as well as campus orientation."

Esra Aksoy, freshman in biology, came to K-State from Turkey. She said the orientation was helpful.

"When I came here, I was confused about registration and enrollment," she said. "But, now, I feel much more comfortable about it. It was informative and really enjoyable."

"I'm glad to be ranked," she said. "I'm surely happy about it."

Lusnic, whose seven wins at the Riviera All-American Championships were the basis of her ranking, said she had anticipated being in her current position.

"Coach Bietau told me that if I'll continue to play like that, I would have a rank," she said. "I think for the coming season, it is a good start. If you're ranked, it's a benefit in a psychological way over my opponents.

"But otherwise, it doesn't affect my game. I'll play the same whether I'm ranked or not."

Bietau agreed that Lusnic's ranking is not the most significant aspect of her game.

"The most important thing that could have happened to Karin last fall was at the regionals, where I think she realized she has to commit more on attacking and not only rely on her ground strokes," he said. "And if she got that point out of the (fall) season, then it will be worth more than any ranking or recognition she can receive.

"If she plays a little more aggressive style, she'll be very, very good."

DEBATE TEAM

K-State ends year as No. 3 in nation

KATIE WALKER
Collegian

K-State's debate team finished the fall semester No. 3 in the nation.

Marist, a New York college, came out on top, and Southwest Missouri State finished second.

K-State's finish was in the top 1 percent since 300 colleges and universities have debate teams competing for the rankings compiled by Intercollegiate Speech Tournament Results. The rankings, which change from month to month, are based on a team's performance throughout the season.

Speech instructor Susan Stanfield compared the system to basketball rankings, because it is cumulative and changes frequently.

K-State's team also qualified nine students in 19 events for the national speech tournament in St. Louis in April.

John Burtis, forensics director, said each semester a committee submits five possible topics for debate to every squad. The squad votes for one topic.

"Colleges and universities have inappropriately altered their curriculum based on issues of race and gender" was the topic for the fall semester.

Jill Baisinger, senior in history, said she didn't like the topic because it was relatively difficult to find issues to research, and some issues were touchy.

Spring semester's topic is, "Advertising reduces the quality of life in the United States."

K-State has placed in the top 10 nationally in the ISTR rankings for the past four years. Last year's debate team was the national champion, while the forensics team, which is made up of the debate and speech teams, placed third out of 650 competing forensics teams.

"I expect us to do as well as last semester and build and do even better," Stanfield said. "We went to 12 tournaments last semester and always had a team get third place or better."

Baisinger said the team's success is due to natural talent and many hours of research.

The first competition this semester was the first weekend of January at the University of Texas at Arlington. All three K-State teams placed in the top six out of 60 teams.

Stanfield said she is sending three teams to the University of Utah at Salt Lake City this weekend. They will be competing against 80 teams in the open division. Stanfield said these teams aren't ones they usually compete against.

"It's a chance to compete against the West Coast teams," she said. "We usually travel in the Midwest."

Committee discusses school finance plan

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The divisive philosophical struggle that soon will engulf the 1992 Kansas Legislature began Wednesday in the House Education Committee.

Tempers that barely were controlled during the committee's review of the school finance task force's report may flare into open warfare as the panel gets deeper into the issue in coming weeks.

The report formed the basis of Gov. Joan Finney's elementary and secondary education funding proposal handed to the Legislature on Tuesday. It calls for state assumption of all funding of public education, including levying a 45-mill statewide property tax and state-mandated local school budgets.

Opponents say it would usurp local control of schools, reduce districts with quality programs to a level of mediocrity and force large property tax increases in districts that presently have low mill levies.

A half-dozen members of the House committee, where the legislation to enact Finney's plan will be introduced, voiced opinions of the plan ranging from deep concern to hostility.

However, Chairman Rick Bowden, a Democrat from Goddard, said the leadership of both political parties had decided the issue of overhauling Kansas' school finance system will be addressed this session.

"The leadership made the decision to proceed, and we will proceed," Bowden said.

The only concession he made to those opposed to a massive overhaul of the School District Equalization Act, passed in 1973, was to seek approval to spend money to bring experts in school funding who testified before the task force back to Topeka to appear before the House committee.

Bowden said Judge Terry Bullock of Shawnee County District Court has given lawmakers the opportunity to rework the law under which state aid is distributed to Kansas' 304 local school districts to truly equalize financial support.

If they don't, Bowden warned, the judge most certainly will declare the present system unconstitutional, and perhaps block distribution of state aid to the districts until a plan acceptable to the courts is enacted.

"I think it's a mistake to say, 'Let's not pass anything and wait for a court decision,'" said Bowden. "He warned of a special session this summer (if nothing is done).

"I am convinced Judge Bullock will not write the school finance plan for us. We will write it. I don't know whether that will be in March, April or May, or in June, July or August."

Bush talks trade in Kansas City

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — President Bush condemned Western Europe's protectionism and defended his recent trade mission to Asia when he spoke to leaders of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Kansas City, Mo., Monday.

About 6,000 people packed into Municipal Auditorium for the federation's annual meeting to hear Bush address farm issues.

The president accused Western Europe of hiding behind an "Iron Curtain of protectionism," using massive export subsidies.'

Bush said he would like to end all government subsidies for farm exports worldwide but would not allow the United States to unilaterally disarm.

"If it weren't for our subsidies, we would lose greater markets to the European Community. I won't do that until other nations do the same thing. I'm not going to put our farmers at a disadvantage," he said.

Bush's remarks advocating more free trade were timely since a meeting was also scheduled Monday for the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade — Uruguay Round negotiations. GATT was an expected topic of discussion, AFBF president Dean Kleckner said.

Kleckner expressed concerns, however, during a news conference Sunday about whether the GATT negotiations would provide meaningful benefits for American farmers.

"All along, we have said that no agreement is better than a bad agreement," Kleckner said.

Bush attempted to allay these concerns during his Monday speech.

"We will not be a part of an agreement unless it's a good agreement for Americans," he said.

Bush also defended his recent trip to Asia, saying it was good for Americans. He said the 12-day journey to the Far East was a beginning step toward building a new world and opening up markets to Americans.

"We reached dozens of new agreements on market openings, and 49 standard agreements in non-auto industries. That was just a start," he said.

"Some political critics say I should not have taken this trip. They're wrong. I will continue to fight for American jobs everywhere. In these times, a president should do no less."

Another concern of AFBF members addressed by Bush was the capital-gains tax.

"Traveling in Asia, I was reminded of the competitive disadvantage with a capital-gains tax. Cutting it will help get our economy back on track," he said. "I need your help to make Congress understand this once and for all."

Environmental issues were touched on briefly by Bush — specifically AFBF members' dissatisfaction with the ambiguous designation of wetlands in a national policy. They would like to see dry lands removed from the category while preserving the true wetlands.

"We're committed to common sense in the wetlands policy," Bush said.

Bush focused on the premise that open markets are the key to Americans' economic future. He conceded, however, that it will take time.

"This new world of opportunity is not going to happen overnight," he said. "We won the cold war, and we will win the competitive war."

happened at about the same time.

The charge for this crime is burglary, and if items were removed from the office, theft will be added to the charge. A conviction of burglary carries a penalty of a minimum of one to three years or a maximum of five to 10 years, Mellgren said.

Rumors were circulating on campus that the finals for Management Concepts and Production Operations management classes were also stolen. A secretary in the management department said the department had no comment.

Gary Robson, assistant professor of accounting, said the final for his Managerial Accounting class was stolen, but he declined to comment any further.

David Donnelly, dean of the business college, also said he did not wish to comment.

Maurice Stark, accounting department head, also said he would rather not comment.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, said he was contacted by Stark about a problem with a final, but he didn't know if anything was actually stolen.

Bosco said the scenario, as related to him, sounded like it may have been a criminal act. He said, however, it would be difficult for a student to obtain keys to University offices.

"It's like crawling through broken glass," he said.

Charles Beckom, campus police chief, said he disagreed.

Beckom said it is moderately easy for a student to obtain a key. Many students are issued keys unnecessarily by faculty, he said. A student can be given a key as long as the department head has signed a request form.

Simply because of the size of the University, many keys are lost, Beckom said. If they fall into the wrong hands, he said, unauthorized people can have access to campus buildings.

Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computing and Information Sciences, said he didn't know the test for Introduction to Personal Computers, a class of about 700 students, had been stolen until about 15 minutes before the Thursday exam.

He said the final exam was thrown out, and the students' grades were reached by averaging the first two exams. He said there will also be another exam offered.

Clark Sexton, coordinator for Introduction to Personal Computers, said he was unable to determine how the tests were obtained. He also said he saw no evidence of forced entry.

Sexton said he first noticed a problem with the tests a few hours before the final was to be given.

He was counting and separating the exams for different exam sites, he said, when he noticed he was missing four tests. He said he specifically remembered that when he had counted the exams earlier, two of the tests were slightly torn. When he counted the exams the second time, the torn copies were gone.

LEGISLATURE

Legislative hotline to serve public again

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

Students and citizens with questions about issues in the Kansas Legislature can call a toll-free number for answers.

The Legislative Reference Section of the Kansas State Library began operation of the Legislative Hotline hotline Monday.

Callers may ask for general information, status of bills, calendars, journals and committee agendas. Requested copies of bills will be mailed. The reference section will also assist in contacting legislators, who will then return the call.

Rita Haley of the Kansas State Library said they operate the hotline every year to keep the public informed about issues that will affect them.

"It's very popular," she said. "The amount of calls we receive depend on the issues. If there's a controversial vote on a certain day, we receive an awful lot of phone calls."

The Legislative Reference collection consists of a complete collection of Kansas bills from 1908 to date, interim reports, journals, calendars, session laws, amendments, statutes and documents relating to legislative research.

The reference section also compiles individual voting records on all roll-call votes of record.

The toll-free number for all Kansans is 1-800-432-3924.

FINANCIAL AID

Students' voices could affect Bush bill

AMY COX
Collegian

If the voices of concerned students and organizations are heard by Congress, a credit history check may not be a factor for federally guaranteed student loans.

President Bush's November 1991 bill requires Stafford and Supplement for Students loan applicants over 21 years of age to undergo a credit check. Because students usually apply for grants and scholarships first, and loans as a last resort, some students may be left without financial aid options, said Larry Moeder, director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

Students with no credit rating would not have it counted against them. The Department of Education has given no final regulations about what constitutes "bad credit," but a bad history will not necessarily disqualify the student. It is up to the lender, and the loan would be approved if a credit-worthy co-signer signs, according to the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators newsletter of Dec. 20, 1991.

Moeder said the financial aid community is concerned, however, with the accuracy of such credit checks.

"One concern is Congress requiring credit checks when there has been a concern about the credit bureaus that do them and the accuracy of such reports."

Students need to ask themselves if they want yet another person having access to their credit history, Moeder said. If not, they need to speak up.

"Students need to write to their congressional representatives immediately," he said, "in order to affect that legislation."

Unfortunately, the tendency will be for Congress to vote against any

"JFK" and K-STATE

MARK ENGLER
Collegian

Oliver Stone's latest film, "JFK," is a three-hour, 10-minute assault on not only the 1964 Warren Commission Report, but the existing political establishment.

By taking a liberal creative license in re-creating the investigation of former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison (Kevin Costner), the film explores alleged connections between Lee Harvey Oswald, Jack Ruby, anti-Castro Cubans, the mob, the FBI and the CIA.

Stone suggests Oswald was not the lone gunman in the assassination. He also suggests Oswald may have, in fact, not even participated in it.

Through Costner's character, Stone dismisses the Warren Report as a fictitious cover-up and adopts the position that John F. Kennedy was the victim of a "military-style ambush" involving no less than three shooters, a veritable "coup d'etat" pulled off by the CIA with Lyndon Johnson waiting in the wings to take office.

Stone's basis for this accusation is that Kennedy was secretly planning to pull U.S. troops out of Vietnam, which Stone presents as the "CIA's playground," and had made it known to some that he would soon dismantle the CIA itself.

In a long speech near the end of the film, a teary-eyed Costner tries to put together for a jury — and the film's audience — all the pieces of the conspiracy. During the course of that speech, he utters the word that sends shivers down the spines of most Americans:

"If it smells like it, feels like it, and looks like it. You call it what it is ... fascism."

Sound like a lot to swallow? Most elements of the media seem to think so. "JFK," while being generally well received on an artistic level by film critics, has been lambasted by the mainstream media.

Among accusations of fact-omission and complaints about Stone's sensationally broad speculation, Costner's portrayal of Garrison has attracted even more criticism.

Critics claim Garrison was not the articulate spokesman of truth and justice the film would lead the audience to believe, but rather a paranoid dreamer who spent thousands of tax dollars chasing phantom conspirators who existed only in his mind. Some critics point to the fact that he was not able to convict Clay Shaw, whose trial the film centers around, as evidence of this.

Oliver Stone

With such films as "Platoon" and "Born on the Fourth of July" to his credit, Stone is no stranger to controversy.

He makes no bones about the fact that he rearranged certain aspects of history for dramatic purposes.

In an article he wrote for the January issue of "Premiere" magazine, Stone said he had taken the liberty of having his Garrison character discover much evidence that was actually uncovered by other researchers.

But in defense of the real Garrison, Stone pointed to ex-CIA director Richard Helms' admission, years after the Shaw trial, that Shaw had in fact worked for the CIA — which Shaw, who died in 1974, had staunchly denied.

Another concern critics have expressed has been about the implementation of scenes, both black and white and color, in which Stone re-creates situations to look as though they were filmed in 1963, complete with poorer quality photography.

After filming, Stone entwined, through the use of some quick-cut editing, the re-created simulations with actual footage from 1963. The end result is so effective that often viewers of the film, excluding those who are quite familiar with the existing authentic footage, are unable to differentiate between what is real and what are Stone's dramatizations.

Local critics

Leroy Page, associate professor of history, said he believes there was not and is not any evidence regarding Kennedy's assassination that would indicate a conspiracy. He said conspiracy theories arose out of the public's inability to accept the possibility that one lone lunatic, who was nonetheless branded a Communist, could kill the president of the United States.

Page said he believes the Warren Report was basically right on target with its description of events, even though it did not go into Oswald's motivation as deeply as it should have.

"The reason people want to believe in conspiracies is so they can blame someone," he said. "Whether it's the

KANSAS BOARD OF REGENTS

Regents chart course for future

"Super chancellor" plan out, compromise proposal approved in Wichita

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Collegian

WICHITA — The Kansas Board of Regents approved a compromise proposal Thursday that will govern the board's future actions.

The Strategy for Mission Development proposal states the board will focus attention on strengthening teaching effectiveness, reviewing the role of remedial education, advocating qualified admissions, continuing efforts to increase faculty pay and defining necessary program duplication.

A proposal was originally introduced for consideration by the board in September, but met with criticism from campus constituencies and was dubbed the "super chancellor" plan.

University officials then issued a second plan in November. A committee was appointed by the board to study both proposals. Eventually, a third mission strategy was agreed upon and adopted during Thursday's meeting on the Wichita State University campus.

The third proposal did not contain any language suggesting the Legislature allocate money to the board, which would then allocate to the six universities. That was what made the first plan unacceptable. The Legislature will continue to allocate directly to the institutions according to the adopted proposal.

K-State Student Body President Jackie McClaskey said she approved of the mission strategy, but was concerned with one aspect.

"It said tuition went up and is still going up. That probably means the Regents are planning on raising it again," she said.

Pittsburg State University Student Body President Sara Scribner represented the Students' Advisory Committee, made up of Regent school student body presidents on the committee that drew up the third proposal. Scribner said there were certain changes SAC wanted for the final document.

"We wanted to get out the provision for equipment fees. It was written in that the board could consider adopting some in the future," she said. "We wanted more of an emphasis on faculty evaluations to increase instructional quality."

Scribner also said SAC wanted more emphasis placed on student assessment tests given after completion of programs.

"That way the universities can know how to improve programs," she said. "We were satisfied with the final document, but it's not what we would have written ourselves."

The mission strategy is introduced by a mission statement that also went through three different proposals.

One was written by former Regent Bob Creighton, and one was written by university presidents and chief academic officers. The third was a combination of the two. Specifically, it was the Creighton proposal with two sentences removed and one paragraph included from the second proposal.

"It was ironic that SAC and the presidents' council supported one document, but the Regents felt it was better to go with Bob's," Scribner said.

K-State President Jon Wefald said both mission statements were acceptable.

"Most people thought we could live with either one," he said.

Regent Rick Harman explained the basic difference between the two documents.

"The Creighton proposal has more of an accountability tone to it as to how we're doing things," he said.

Because Creighton's term expired in December, a new face was welcomed to the board during Thursday's meeting, Regent Frank Sabatini of Topeka.

Other Regents' action included approving a private fund-raising campaign by K-State's Athletic Department to finance a $3.625 million press box and a $2.975 million indoor practice facility.

MULTICULTURAL AFFAIRS

Taylor-Archer's position divided

Graduate School position not filled; funds unavailable

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian

Mordean Taylor-Archer's dual position as the assistant provost for multicultural affairs and assistant dean of graduate development for the Graduate School has been divided.

Taylor-Archer's new position as assistant dean of multicultural affairs and subsequent move to Anderson Hall made it necessary to redesign existing space in Anderson. Cash shortages will not allow the position she vacated in the Graduate School to be filled.

Rumors among office personnel suggest part of Taylor-Archer's job split stems from a personal conflict with the dean of the Graduate School, Tim Donoghue. Taylor-Archer refused to confirm or deny the validity of the rumors.

Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, denied such rumors.

"I don't know anything about a personal conflict," Bosco said. "Taylor-Archer's move here, as far as I know, was both programmatic and logistical."

Bosco said the term programmatic is appropriate because the University has plans to emphasize cultural diversity more strongly in the future. These changes will link the dean of multicultural affairs more closely with students and increase the dean's visibility on campus.

Taylor-Archer said she agreed the move was logistical.

"Where my office is now, I have to walk across the street every time I need to interact with Pat Bosco or Bob Krause," she said. "My concern is having a place to go where I can get my work done. And from a logistical point of view, locating my office in Anderson makes sense."

The move made it necessary to reorganize the space in Anderson. The changes involved reusing existing office space and knocking out walls to reclaim unused space.

"We took out the old post office area and moved the wall out," Bosco said. "We also took a piece of the admissions office."

Richard Elkins, director of admissions, said although the Office of Admissions lost space, it will make up for the loss with new space-saving furniture.

"I think we came out at zero. We didn't really gain anything, and we didn't lose anything. We just traded space for modular furniture and carpet," he said.

The Anderson reorganization cost the University $56,000. Part of this total — $32,000 — is for building costs, and the other $24,000 is for the modular furniture.

Because Anderson is part of the National Register of Historic Places, all architectural changes were cleared through the preservation department of Kansas State Historical Society.

Bosco said the changes were minor and, therefore, almost immediately approved. Keeping the changes within the limits of what the preservation board allowed did not add to renovation costs, Bosco said.

Money for the Anderson renovations came from two places, Bosco said. The $32,000 for capital improvements came from general facilities funding, and $24,000 for furniture was from a non-state restricted fee.

NEWS DIGEST

▶ '91 INFLATION 3.1 PERCENT

WASHINGTON (AP) — A stagnant economy and the end of the Persian Gulf War gave Americans the second lowest inflation rate in 24 years, the Labor Department reported Thursday. The inflation rate was 3.1 percent for 1991.

At the end of the gulf war, fuel prices were down because Saudi Arabia had increased production to balance oil prices, which increased after the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

An inflation rate between 3 and 3.5 percent is expected for 1992 because of the weak economic recovery.

At 11:13 p.m., a vehicle driven by Jerry B. Nolan, 3509 Minton's Landing, hit a light pole at 17th Street and Anderson Avenue. A major-damage, injury-accident report was filed and the subject was transported by ambulance for injuries. KPL was advised.

THURSDAY, JAN. 16

At 5:42 a.m., Alpha Chi Omega, 1835 Todd Road, reported an unwanted male subject in the sleeping dorm. RCPD was unable to get a description, checked the area and found no one.

At 9:42 a.m., Rebecca Hamilton, 2120 Westchester, No. 6, reported a past hit-and-run to a parked and unattended car. A major-damage, hit-and-run report was filed.

At 11:05 a.m., Tamara Jane Cusic, 1106 Ratone Lane, was arrested for failure to appear on Manhattan City Warrant #914463. She was confined in Riley County Jail in lieu of $1,200.00 bond.

At 1:00 p.m., Leonard Hillstrom, Rt. 1 Box 14, Randolph , reported stolen, one black, 600 lb. heifer. A theft of cattle report was filed. Loss was $450.00.

At 5:00 p.m., Jeanette K. Webb, 1220 Ratone St., was arrested on Manhattan City Warrant #92-154 for failure to appear. The subject was confined in lieu of $600.00 bond.

"Black Dignity" photos larger than life

HEATHER ANDERSON
Collegian

To most people, it's just another good art show.

But to Syvette Davis, freshman in English and pre-law, it's a conscience.

"Black Dignity," a current photography exhibit in Holton Hall, features posed studio shots recovered from what was E.E. Henry Studio in Leavenworth.

One of the faces that gazes larger than life from the wall is Davis's great-grandmother, Ella Evans. Davis, who is from Leavenworth, said when the photo exhibit was officially unveiled last year, many went to see if they were related to the subjects. An aunt recognized the portrait.

"Before the exhibit, I had never asked about her, because she died long before I was born," Davis said.

"She was the only one in the family to receive an education, and it makes me want to work harder, remembering what she must have went through," she said. "It gives you a good feeling."

Upon examining the faces of the subjects, it is easy to see why it is so appropriately titled "Black Dignity." Much photography examining the black community, especially from the early 1900s, focuses on poverty and oppressive conditions. This one instead shows the strength, beauty and, to a certain point, affluence of the people living in Leavenworth at the turn of the century.

The exhibit is from the Carnegie Arts Center in Leavenworth, and it will be displayed until the end of January in Holton 101 and 201.

The photos deal an exciting combination of quality prints and the communication of emotion. All are posed studio shots, but because so much is obvious about the subjects, they become art.

The viewer is greeted in the foyer of Holton by the strong, steady gaze of "Geraldine Jones." At first glance, it appears she is wearing soft, gauze-like fabrics, but upon closer inspection, it is revealed as detailed wrinkles in sturdy cotton.

Most of the pictures feature intimate detail of fabrics, texture and decorations in clothing. From lace to velvet to cotton, the reproduction of the prints from glass-plate negatives nearly 100 years old is remarkable.

MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. DAY

Task force member sponsors rap contest, teaches children

HEATHER ANDERSON
Collegian

Bill Martin doesn't like the way black school children are taught about their ethnic heritage. And he's doing something about it.

Martin, member of the Martin Luther King Jr. Task Force, is sponsoring a rap contest in conjunction with local Martin Luther King Jr. Day celebrations.

The preliminary competitions will begin at 1 p.m. Saturday and Sunday at Manhattan Town Center, and the finals are scheduled to begin at noon Monday.

The contest is part of a three-day multicultural fair at the mall, which will include educational and vendor's booths as well as various performers.

Many of the rap entries have been from grade-school-aged children, and for that Martin said he is excited about the educational possibilities.

"I know of big kids — we're talking high-school age here — who may know who Martin Luther King is, but have no idea why he is important or what he did," he said.

He explained how rap music explores the issues of civil rights, discrimination and problems within the black community.

"Rap mixes history with today — it's kind of an enjoyable way for kids to learn about history," he said.

Kathleen Adams, marketing director of Manhattan Town Center, said the mall is the ideal location for the event.

"We are fortunate to have large, enclosed spaces that are open to the public," she said.

"Manhattan is a multicultural community, and we would like to use this event to educate the community that there are other cultures, and they have very special things to offer," Adams said.

Mary Nichols, instructor of speech and organizer of the event, said she agrees with the educational objectives.

"When the school board decided not to have school on Martin Luther King Day, we wanted to make it a community holiday to teach the kids why they aren't in school," she said.

"I'm old enough to remember peace marches, but we need to teach the older people why the kids are out of school and teach the kids as well. Education is more than 8 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. in the classroom," she said.

Martin said he is grateful for the community's effort to celebrate King's birthday this year and hopes it will continue.

"We're glad for the opportunity to teach about King, but we'd like to see black history taught all year," Martin said.

"When a black kid sits in a schoolroom, all he sees in textbooks are pictures of 'his kind' sitting crammed in slave boats, or like Malcolm X getting shot. We need to talk about black accomplishments.

"European contributions are important and significant to our culture, but we also need to start teaching about Native Americans, African-Americans, Japanese-Americans, Mexican-Americans ... every group's important contributions."

The current press box was created as a temporary press box when the stadium was built in 1968. During the Regents meeting it was described as a "plywood press box about to fall down."

Donald Slawson, Regents' chairman, said he was initially against approving the plan until he visited K-State to see it.

"It's horrible," he said.

Wefald said the new indoor practice facility would be an addition to the current facility, the Brandeberry Complex.

"Brandeberry is used so much, it needs to be expanded. The older part will still be used for baseball and the new part for football," he said.

BILL OF RIGHTS

BEING AN AMERICAN

"Americanism is a question of principle, of purpose, of idealism, of character; it is not a matter of birthplace or creed or line of descent."

— Theodore Roosevelt, 1909

EDITORIALS

"JFK" worth the inquiry of Americans

Almost 30 years after John F. Kennedy was shot as his motorcade inched through Dealey Plaza in downtown Dallas, the question of who murdered him and why is still as valid and frightening as when it was investigated by the Warren Commission.

Critics say Oliver Stone's "JFK" is just one man's story of what happened that day, and that moviegoers will bite — hook, line and sinker.

Stone is rummaging through the U.S. government's closet full of skeletons and holding things up for the world to see. What he finds makes people ashamed to be American.

They say Stone is rewriting history, that the movie isn't historically accurate. But you don't have to see "JFK" to know the Warren report isn't quite historically accurate either.

Sure, the film doesn't present all views of what happened, but it's not about that; it's about Jim Garrison's views. Maybe Stone does change exactly how and where some things happened, but this is movie-making. That's what directors do.

Movie-making is about imagination, creativity and vision. Stone is presenting ideas and possibilities. It's up to the people who watch the movie to decide for themselves.

Stone isn't saying it happened this way; he is saying it didn't happen the way they said it did. And maybe, just maybe, it happened this way .

Having the information in front of you and the right to decide for yourself is what this movie is all about.

Our government never gave the American people the chance or the right to decide back then.

Therein lies the greatest danger — not that "JFK" makes people talk and convinces some people it happened the way Garrison said it did. The danger is that the U.S. government tried to convince the American people it happened the way the Warren Commission said it did.

"JFK" is as much a cause as it is a movie, and Stone is not alone in his mission.

Only two months ago, a few blocks from the assassination site, a symposium was aimed to convince the government to release all sealed information about the assassination and reopen an inquiry into the event.

The John F. Kennedy Assassination Center is as popular today as ever. And the proliferation of studies, books, documentaries and movies about Kennedy's assassination is proof enough. Stone isn't the only person who wants to provide people with an alternative.

Go see "JFK." Don't swallow it. Chew it up. And if you're really interested, read or watch some other pieces of work about the assassination.

It's your right.

Exercise needed to celebrate Bill of Rights

Your 200th birthday has come and gone, and your children barely noticed.

Some of them don't even know who you are or have never taken the time to get to know you.

It's a scary thought.

These are the same children you were born to protect, and it is that protection that is of the most concern.

This is not a fairy tale, but a true story that shouldn't have happened.

This is the story of the Bill of Rights. This document, the people's safeguard against its government, is by far the most valued American treasure.

Last year, its bicentennial was celebrated with little fanfare and equally depressing use by the citizens of this great country.

Americans don't need balloons and cake to mark this anniversary. Instead, we need desire to uphold the purpose of the solid document. That purpose is exercise — not sit-ups and jumping jacks, but action.

As our freedoms of choice are threatened, Americans can no longer depend solely on the Bill of Rights for protection. Instead,we must protect it.

The black edge of fee payment

I spoke once about walking on the edge of the black abyss and the inherent danger we must all face once we've decided to do so. Life is replete with such walks, be they along the grand abyss of experience or the ones we choose to personally create for ourselves.

As I approached Ahearn Field House earlier this week to engage in that dreaded enrollment activity, the abyss again opened before me much like something out of a Stephen King novel, complete with stone Gothic gargoyles appearing on the roof, black crows milling and cawing about, and the empty eyes of my fellow students who held as much despair toward enrollment as I did.

JARED GREGOIRE

Yes, my nightmare was beginning, and I was helpless to stop it or even avoid it.

After a few minutes of standing in sub-freezing temperatures, I became convinced someone must be paying the school administration to assist in performing hypothermia tests on students. Obviously, this was made easier for the experimenters by cramming the enrollment period into two days, thus forcing the students, already considerably weakened by the dread of writing out fee checks, easier to study and manage.

As hundreds of students tried to cram through two or three doors in search of reprieve from the cold, I couldn't get the image of cattle being herded into the slaughter house out of my mind.

As I entered, I couldn't help but notice something carved in Latin into the stones above the doors. Someone behind me mentioned that it was from Dante's "Inferno," and, roughly translated, it said, "Cast away all hope, ye who enter herein."

In other words, "Welcome to hell."

"Cast away ... all hope, ye ... who enter ... herein"

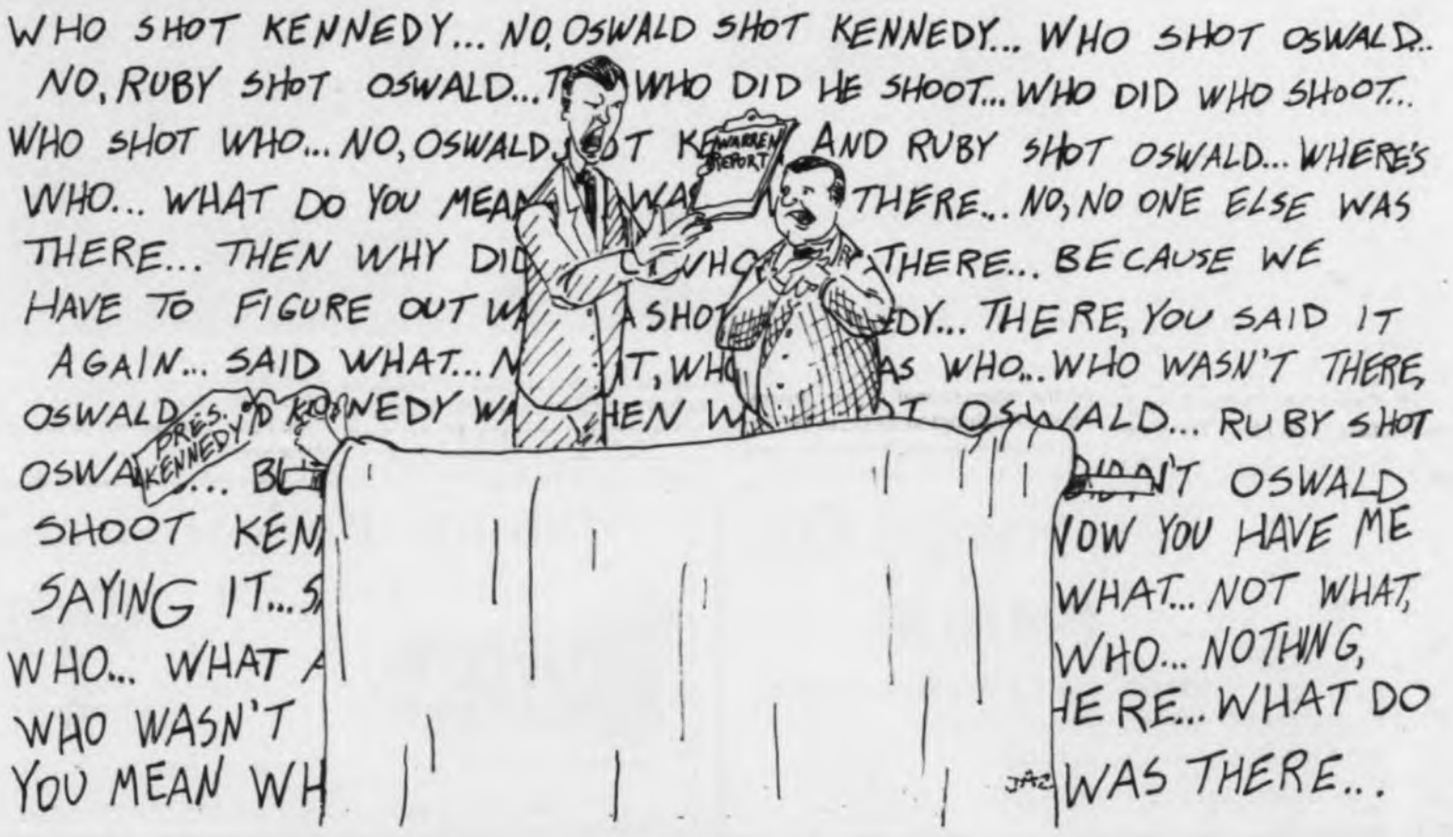
After successfully passing the security check and pat-down at the door by the ID checker, who looked something like a cross between Fat Albert and Janis Joplin, I continued past the oil drums full of petroleum jelly (For Your Convenience! Compliments of K-State!) and picked up all those necessary things to get me to that shrine of the poor college student: the Financial Aid Table.

Before receiving my check, I had to review the regulations concerning my obligations. Talk about hell incarnate.

If memory serves, the guidelines went something like this: "Said procurer will sign each 207Z6 forms in triplicate, then transfer all relevant tutorial finances to the proper retaining personnel for processing, thus expediting said process to a relative degree of efficiency.

"We then require all individuals to submit to a blood sample test for proper DNA encoding, necessitating positive proof of identification upon payment of said financial procurement. An iron-clad oath promising first-born child as collateral in case of delinquencies during the reimbursement period is required. Failure to follow these guidelines may result in substantial penalties, including being forced to watch every episode of 'Gilligan's Island' or death by firing squad, whichever the payee may choose. Have a Nice Day!"

I suppose I would have a tough time deciding between the two, so I silently promised myself to avoid any such financial failures in the future. (Every episode? That's really cold.)



Having survived this and a brutal assault by some freshman who desperately wanted me to buy a yearbook, I finally made it to the payment area.

Hearing the moans and screaming, I knew I had arrived, and it was true carnage. I figure I'll have these paper cuts for some time, considering how viciously the teller tore the check from my scarred hands.

So I survived yet another episode, another walk along the black edge, and I escaped from hell with hardly a cent to my name.

Time will tell if it was worth the effort, for only when I'm sure there will be no "Gilligan's Island" for this kid will I truly rest in peace.

EDITORIAL CARTOON

Racism is buzzing around everywhere

Lately, a lot of people have become hyper-aware of the word "racism."

People are writing, discussing and analyzing the issue. A great deal of educated people are learning the "buzz words" and "buzz ideas," such as "people of color," as if Caucasians are clear and a racist joke constitutes racism. I must say this movement is good, but problems exist.

During the past four years, I have been involved with several organizations, such as Refuse and Resist and Anti-Racist Action, which deals with the problems of "-isms" (racism, sexism, classism and ismism.)

Although I claim no expertise, I have some ideas about the direction the movement is taking. In particular, "reverse racism" and the "Black Power" movement.

PETER J. ARROYO GUEST

If you look to Webster's, you find "racism" to be "the belief that one race is superior to another." The definition does not read, "whites hating blacks, blacks hating whites, Hispanics hating Jews, Asians hating people of mixed races or green people hating plaid people." Racism is colorblind.

If you blame another race for the problems you face, your behavior is racist. If you look at a person of another race and feel disgust, hatred, pity or envy, your behavior is racist. That is the denotation of the word.

The connotation of the word is whites hating those who are not white. Therefore, if you are not white and hate those who are white, it is "reverse racism." This is simply a rationalization for the racist behavior exhibited by people of color. It puts whites at the focus of the problem. It is racism.

The Ku Klux Klan and White Power, Neo-Nazi boneheads are racists. They believe the white race is superior and must be preserved. They claim people who are not White Anglo-Saxon Protestant are the cause for all problems and must be suppressed or eliminated. Separation is the theme.

(Notice I did not use the word "skinhead." The truth is that racists are a minority in the skinhead subculture. Anyone who cared enough to explore the issue deeper than the self-serving talk show hosts allow would know that.)

The extreme Black Power movement claims the black race is superior and must be preserved, the white race is the cause of all the problems blacks are facing, and revolt against and suppression of whites is necessary. Separation is the theme.

"If you are not white and hate those who are white, it is reverse racism"

Both groups are saying the same thing. The latter is tolerated because of the latent guilt that has become the politically correct standard for our society, simply because the white majority has systematically suppressed minority populations for so long. Whether tolerated or not, racism is still racism.

Even the man who is being hailed as the father of the extreme Black Power movement, Malcolm X, came to realize that the ideas of his youth were of hatred and racism.

He realized that "by any means necessary" is the same violent close-minded foundation that supports the Ku Klux Klan. His ideas then shifted toward the teachings of Martin Luther King Jr. Unfortunately, when he began to speak of his enlightenment, he was killed.

Separation is being called for not only by blacks and whites, but also by many Hispanics and Asians. I feel separation is wrong. By separating from one another, we lose the opportunity to share with and experience one other.

Alienation replaces familiarity. This alienation causes ignorance. Ignorance breeds fear. Fear breeds hatred. Hatred breeds racism. Thus, the "cure" that is being proposed becomes the "cause" of the problem.

Please understand I am not saying that taking action for equality or taking pride in your ethnicity is wrong. Both are wonderful activities. However, one must be cautious that the action being taken is not just "getting even," and the pride doesn't result in a feeling of superiority. These two ideas can generalize over other issues, such as sexism, classism, ageism, etc.

I realize the things I have written are going to anger some people, but a lot of people have been wanting to say the same things. As a Puerto-Rican American, I experience racism from two foci: that aimed at my people and that my people aim at others. I believe everyone does.

Many people of color are justifiably angry at the way we have been treated, but that is no excuse to return the treatment. Revenge does not constitute justice. Two wrongs do not make a right.

As you kick back and relax this Martin Luther King Jr. Day, think about the reason for the holiday — to celebrate the ideas that we can live together as brothers and sisters; that we are all equal and should not be judged by race, religion, gender or social position, but by "the content of our character."

U.S. government and right-wing elements, or whether it's Castro and/or the Russians, people promote these conspiracy theories for political purposes.

"When you talk about a conspiracy like this, you have to bring in everybody, and it becomes so huge that it's hard to believe, especially when there's no evidence to support it."

Harry Marsh, professor of journalism, was working for the New York Herald-Tribune when he heard Kennedy had been shot. Like millions of Americans who were living at that time, he remembers exactly where he was, what he was doing and the thoughts that ran through his mind when he heard the news.

"My first thought was kind of weird," he said. "I'm from Texas, and I always thought Lyndon Johnson was a political opportunist. My first thought was 'Oh my gosh, Lyndon Johnson will do anything to get into office.'"

Ironically, Marsh said he, too, now believes the findings of the Warren Commission were for the most part the truth.

According to recent polls and surveys conducted by various media organizations, the agreement that Marsh and Page share about the Warren Commission — that Oswald acted alone — puts them among a minority of Americans. Poles by the Washington Post, Time and CNN have indicated that more than 50 percent of those surveyed believed there was some type of conspiracy to kill Kennedy.

Warren Commission

The President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy, or Warren Commission (named after Chief Justice Earl Warren, who headed the panel), was created Nov. 29, 1963, by newly sworn-in President Lyndon Johnson.

The purpose of the seven-man commission was to investigate the assassination of Kennedy and the subsequent murder of suspected assassin Oswald.

After 10 months of probing the physical evidence of the case and examining the transcripts of more than 20,000 interviews conducted by the FBI and Secret Service, the Warren Commission published an 888-page report detailing its findings.

The Warren Commission concluded that Oswald, armed with a bolt action Mannlicher-Carcano 6.5 millimeter rifle, fired three shots from the sixth floor of the Dallas Schoolbook Depository building. The shots killed Kennedy and seriously wounded Texas Gov. John Connally Jr., who was riding in the seat in front of Kennedy.

Two days later in the basement of the Dallas Police Station, Oswald, who had been arrested shortly after the assassination, was in the process of being transferred to another jail when he was shot at point-blank range by Jack Ruby, Dallas nightclub owner.

The commission determined that Ruby had probably gained entrance into the basement by walking down a ramp that lead onto the street above.

The commission found that Oswald had been the lone assassin in the slaying of Kennedy, and that he had acted of his own free will. It further concluded that, prior to the Kennedy assassination, Ruby had had no knowledge of Oswald, nor Oswald of Ruby.

To date, the Warren Commission's findings are regarded as the "official" version of what took place in Dallas some 28 years ago.

Differing Opinions

In Manhattan, the negative publicity "JFK" has received is apparent in the opinions voiced by those who have and have not seen the film.

"What I've read of the 'JFK' film leads me to believe that it over-dramatizes Jim Garrison and ignores evidence that isn't disputable — that it tends to play down what most people would consider to be relevant," said William Richter, head of the political science department. "But I haven't seen the film."

Richter said although he has not extensively studied the circumstances surrounding the Kennedy assassination, he has not come into contact with anything that would cause him to question the core issues of the Warren Report.

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey said she believed a lot of the negative publicity the film has been getting is unwarranted.

"I haven't seen the movie yet, but I plan to," she said. "We all know when we go to the movies that it's fiction."

McClaskey said she believes Kennedy's assassination was not as simple as it was made out to be and whether or not "JFK" portrays what really happened, there was "evidently something that the public didn't know about."

"The biggest problem, as I see it, is that journalists are the ones screaming and hollering about the movie," Robert Daly, associate professor of journalism, said.

"I think the press is protesting so much because they didn't do their jobs to begin with," he said. "While the Warren Commission was doing its investigation, there was no absolute solid job of investigative reporting done by any journalist working for a newspaper."

Daly said a problem arose from the beginning when, like everyone else in America, the press was so taken aback by the events in Dallas that they basically missed the opportunity to uncover information for themselves and were left relaying to the general public whatever the government gave them.

"They did it automatically," Daly said. "We generally see it in wartime. We saw it recently with Bush. People rally around patriotism and they rally around their leaders. The press was so caught up at that time with parroting what was being said by the government that now, some 30 years later, people are still wondering what happened."

Roger Johnson, associate director of the international grains program, was in Washington, D.C., in 1963 and witnessed Kennedy's funeral procession.

"One of the frustrations I will carry with me the rest of my life, as will many people who lived through that period, is the feeling that we do not know for sure what happened," said Johnson, who has a doctorate in American history.

"The major question that concerns me is the so-called 'magic bullet.' How could one bullet have gone through Kennedy's neck and then also caused damage to Governor Connally's body and emerged virtually pristine? That's an extraordinarily difficult thing to explain."

The "Magic Bullet"

The Warren Commission concluded three shots were fired from Oswald's weapon. However, a frame-by-frame analysis of the famous home movie of the assassination filmed by Abraham Zapruder shows that Kennedy and Connally were both wounded in 6.7 seconds.

If it could be proven that any of the injuries sustained by Kennedy or Connally were caused by a fourth bullet, the time-frame evidence of the Zapruder film would indicate that someone else would have to have been firing at the presidential limousine from a different position — a conclusion the Warren Report vigorously denies.

It was determined that one bullet missed completely and one bullet fatally struck Kennedy in the head. That left one bullet accountable for piercing and exiting Kennedy's neck, entering Connally's back, exiting after breaking one of Connally's ribs, passing through Connally's wrist and finally coming to rest in his thigh — one bullet, seven surface wounds.

The bullet's incredible journey through bone and heavy tissue left it none for the worse. It was found on Connally's stretcher missing less than 2 percent of its total mass.

Many experts said the bullet could have lost at least that much by simply being fired into the air. To this day, there is much argument among researchers of the Kennedy assassination as to whether or not the path of the bullet is possible, and if it is, would the bullet emerge "virtually pristine."

Student Reactions

Before "JFK" film credits start to roll, the last thing the audience sees on the screen is this: "DEDICATED TO THE YOUNG, IN WHOSE SPIRIT THE SEARCH FOR TRUTH MARCHES ON."

It is possible that Stone foresaw the negative reaction the film would receive from older Americans. In Manhattan, of those who have seen the film, college students seem to be offering the strongest positive reaction.

"I walked out going, 'Wow, what if he's right?'" said Heather Riley, senior in English and Student Senate chairwoman. "It's fairly obvious to me at this point that there is more to the issue ... than was or may ever be known."

Riley said she entered the theater duly warned by the media that she was entering the world of movie magic, and not a world of complete reality.

"I felt myself trying to doubt a lot of what the movie was saying," she said. "But there was so much in it that couldn't have possibly been completely made up. No matter how you look at it, you have to doubt the Warren Commission's findings."

Chuck Davis, senior in architecture, said he was worried by all the bad press the "JFK" had received before he went to see the film. He said he was afraid that Stone, whom he admires as a filmmaker, had made a major mistake by tampering with the truth about the Kennedy assassination.

"I just basically believed what everyone had told me," he said. "I believed Kennedy had been shot by Oswald, Oswald had been shot by Ruby, and that was all there was to it."

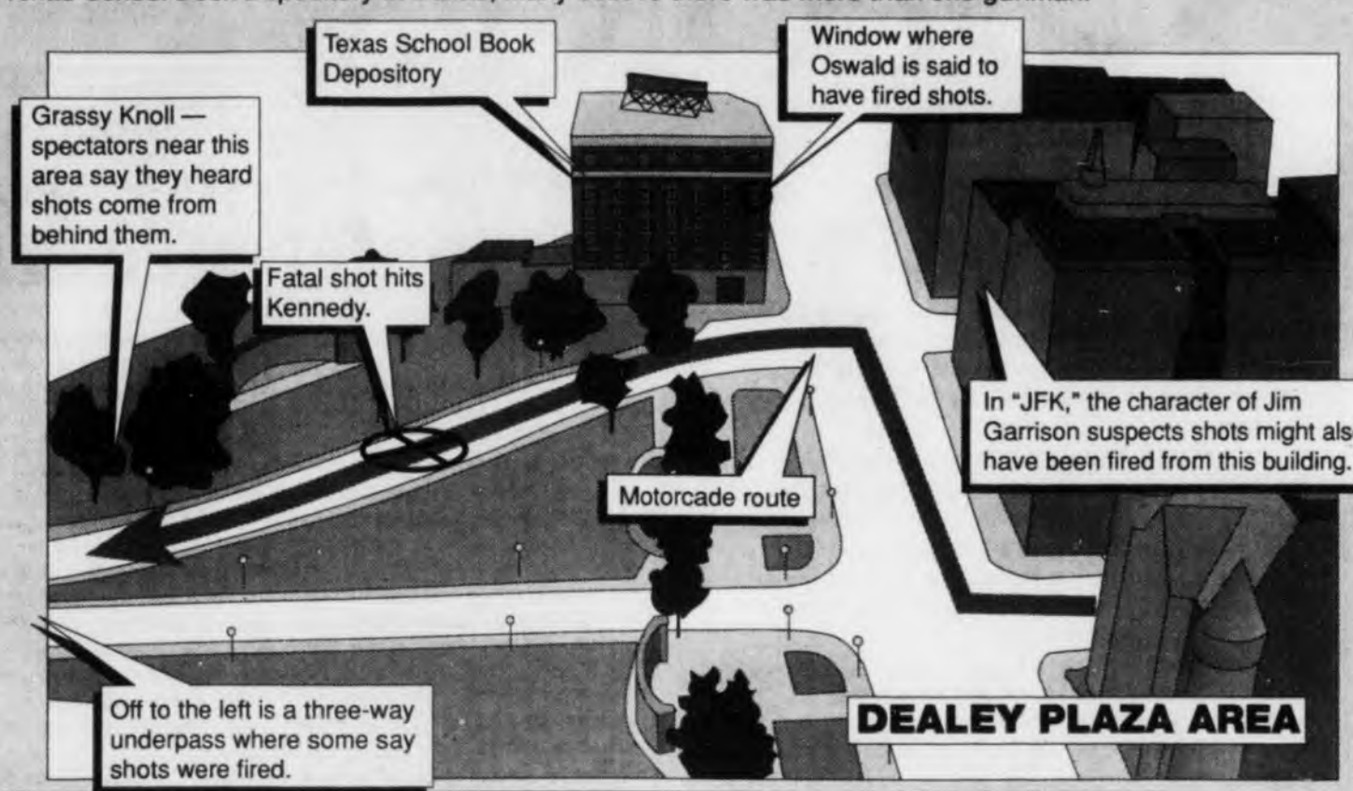
After seeing the film, Davis said, he was prompted to do some research about the assassination. He said that research, coupled with the movie, has left in his mind some serious doubts about the real truth.

"I read the Newsweek article about the movie, and it was supposed to discount Stone," he said. "But after reading it, I was even more doubtful about the Warren Commission. When you see the movie and it talks about people like Clay Shaw and David Ferrie, who you've never heard of, you don't know whether to believe it or not. But when you see their pictures in Newsweek, and it actually talks about them being in the CIA, it gives the movie more credibility."

Jason Miles, senior in political science, said he did not like Stone's quick-mixing of false and authentic footage, and he felt the film was extremely biased. However, he said he would highly recommend it.

"You walked out of there feeling like somebody had hit you in the stomach," he said.

"I happen to believe that we weren't told the whole story (by the Warren Commission). And for that matter, Congress agreed when it said there was a conspiracy, but congressmen didn't know who or what ," Miles said, referring to the 1979 House Select Committee on Assassination's decision that a conspiracy in the Kennedy murder was "probable."

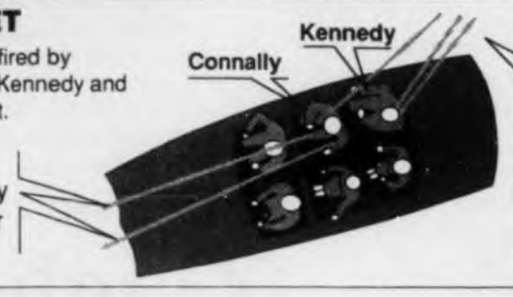


Miles said he has read much of the Warren Report and feels the "Stone-personal-bias" argument is a bit beside the point anyway because a lot of the evidence used in the film is irrefutable.

He said its possible the reason some older Americans are having so much trouble accepting Stone's movie or conspiracy theories in general is because of the bleakness of the ending message.

"Maybe they accepted the Warren Report because its easier to believe that one guy did it than to think — and I'm not saying they did — that the government did it or helped cover it up," he said. "That would kind of destroy everything we supposedly believe in."

SHOTS FIRED



Although the Warren Commission said the lone assasin of John F. Kennedy was Lee Harvey Oswald, who fired shots from the Texas School Book Depository in Dallas, many believe there was more than one gunman.

SOLUTION TO THE MAGIC BULLET

The "Magic Bullet" is the second shot thought to be fired by Oswald. This bullet made seven surface wounds in Kennedy and Texas Gov. John Connally but survived almost intact.

■ If two shots were fired from a forward position such as the underpass or the Grassy Knoll, then a hole in the windshield of the car would be explained.

■ Oswald fired three shots in less than 6.7 seconds from the sixth floor, through tree branches. Most say this is an impossible feat for even the best marksman.

Erickson inks 5-year pact

CORAL GABLES, Fla. (AP) — Coach Dennis Erickson, who has repeatedly said he'll stay with the Miami Hurricanes rather than take an NFL job, put the pledge in writing on a new five-year contract Thursday.

Erickson has led the Hurricanes to the national championship in two of his three seasons at Miami. In the past month he has been mentioned as a candidate for nearly every vacant NFL job.

This season, the Hurricanes shared the national championship with Washington. The Huskies were No. 1 in the coaches poll.

"It's important to me to stay here for the players at the University of Miami and to maintain the stability of the program," Erickson said in a statement. "My family and I love the university and the south Florida community, and hope to remain here a long time."

The new agreement extends Erickson's contract through 1996. Other terms weren't disclosed. Erickson's old contract, which was scheduled to expire in 1995, paid him an estimated $250,000 a year.

Erickson, 44, has a three-year record of 33-3 at Miami. The Hurricanes finished 12-0 in 1991.

"This simply indicates our confidence and appreciation for Dennis' leadership and success," athletic director Dave Maggard said.

Huskies knock off No.7 Arizona

SEATTLE (AP) — Rich Manning sank a 15-foot jump shot from the side with one second to go and Washington stung No. 7 Arizona 62-60 Thursday night.

Manning led the Huskies (8-4 overall, 2-0 Pacific-10) to their upset win with 16 points.

The Wildcats (10-3, 1-2), who had a 71-game homecourt winning streak broken by UCLA last Saturday, were led by Ed Stokes' 19.

The Wildcats tied the score at 60 on Chris Mills' 3-point shot with 11 seconds to go.

After Mills tied the score, Washington inbounded the ball under its own basket and got the ball to the Huskies' 6-foot-10 junior center. Manning squared up to the basket and then dropped in the game-winning basket.

Stanford high on new grid coach

STANFORD, Calif. (AP) — Bill Walsh said Thursday his toughest job as Stanford's new coach would be trying to adequately replace Dennis Green, whose departure to coach the Minnesota Vikings created the opening.

The hiring of the former San Francisco 49ers coach, three-time Super Bowl winner and football Hall of Fame nominee brought expectations beyond the football field.

Students are hoping the addition of Walsh will help pull the private school out of the economic doldrums, which have coincided with the recession.

Stanford, which charges undergraduate students $15,000 annually in tuition, faces a $43 million revenue shortfall. It has asked all of its departments to make cuts over the next two years to close the budget gap.

Molly Kerry, a sophomore drama major, said Walsh's hiring could be an economic boon to the university.

"I'm optimistic that this will help," she said. "I'm a drama major and that's one of the threatened majors. But if sport is what's going to help the university regain financial stability, Bill Walsh is the one to do it. I think his being here will create more revenue for the university."

Stanford quarterback Steve Stenstrom said he could see only positives in Walsh's return. Walsh had a 17-7 record as Stanford's head coach before leaving to join the San Francisco 49ers in 1979, where he won three Super Bowls in 10 years before joining NBC as an analyst in 1989.

"A name like Bill Walsh is going to attract so much attention, I think revenues are going to go up so that there will be a far greater return," Stenstrom said. "I think the student body is really behind the program."

CATS BASKETBALL

Key conference stretch begins with Sooners

DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian

Welcome to Basketball 101. I'm Professor Altman, and it's time to do some hoops math.

In this story problem, Team A — let's call them the Cats — has a record of 8-4. Team A has 15 games left on its schedule, 13 of them in conference play and nine of them at home.

Assuming Team A wins its two remaining non-conference games, it reaches the 10-win plateau, right? Still with me?

How many games, then, must the team win in the remaining Big Eight contests — seven at home and six on the road — to reach the magic 17-win mark that normally means a dance in the NCAA postseason ball?

Did someone back there say seven? Good! You pass the course.

No, Dana Altman hasn't joined University President Jon Wefald as a classroom teacher.

But the point made here is one Altman has likely made with his players: if you want to be a part of March Madness, you've got to get it done in January and February.

K-State's first step toward the team's unspoken goal of returning to the NCAA Tournament comes Saturday when the Cats host Oklahoma in an 8 p.m. tilt in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats, for those of you with selective amnesia, are 0-1 in Big Eight play and so are the 23rd-ranked Sooners. K-State was blown out by Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla., and Oklahoma fell to Iowa State in Ames, Iowa.

Many are calling the Wildcat conference home opener the biggest game of the year for K-State. Altman isn't ready to say that just yet.

"I'm not sure it's the key game of the year, but it's a big one," Altman said at his weekly meeting with the media Tuesday.

The game will be the seventh-straight road contest for OU, 10-2 overall. But this is a Sooner team that will have had a full week to prepare for the Cats when it takes the floor Saturday night.

"It's important for us to play well, especially at home," Altman said. "And Oklahoma is coming off of two losses and will have had a full week to prepare."

The prospect of a hungry Sooner team invading Bramlage has Altman a bit worried.

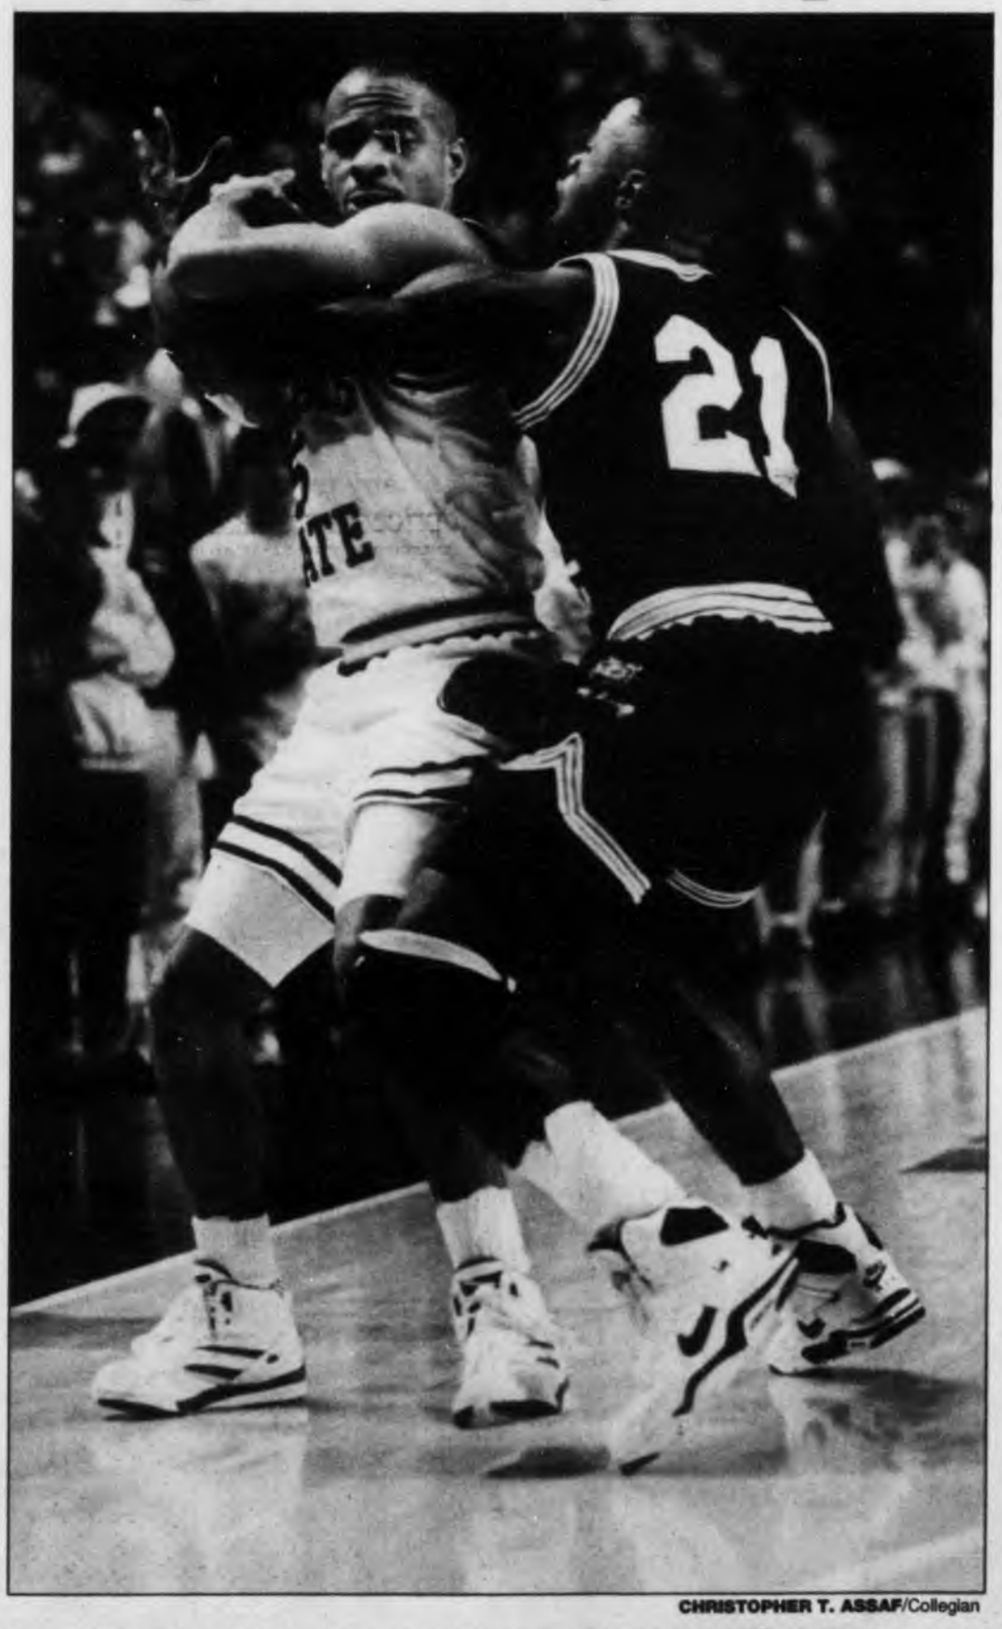
"When you first watch Oklahoma, I think their athleticism is the thing that jumps out at you," Altman said.

With K-State attempting to employ a bit more of an up-tempo attack these days, one would think that Altman might be playing right into Billy Tubbs' hands.

But K-State won't drastically alter what it has been attempting, said Altman, whose team swept the Sooners in his first season as K-State coach.

"As teams slow them down a bit, their half court offense becomes important also," Altman said of OU. "But we're going to look to push the ball when we get the opportunity.

"We've got to get back, though, and get the defense set."



One player Altman is concerned with defending against is OU senior forward Damon Patterson, who is averaging 24.7 points and 9.7 rebounds an outing.

"He gives them someone who can go inside and outside and score," Altman said.

Since the conference-opening loss to OSU, K-State has grabbed a pair of home non-conference wins over SIU-Edwardsville and Wichita State. K-State has won its last two Bramlage meetings with the Sooners — both of which were televised by ESPN — by an average margin of 20 points.

INSIDE STUFF

Zeigler ready to put injury in past

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Collegian

Marcus Zeigler's return has added depth and ball handling ability to the point guard position, something the Cats haven't had since he and Brian Henson went down with injuries.

Healing hand no longer hindering point guard's performance on the floor

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

He's back.

The time when K-State's true point guard Marcus Zeigler had to watch his teammates helpless from the bench is finally over.

After a five-game absence, Zeigler returned to the court in K-State's home game against Southern Illinois-Edwardsville Jan. 11 with a warm applause from Wildcat fans. He was off the floor during K-State's road trips with a broken bone in his right hand.

Originally planning to give Zeigler only a couple minutes playing time in the SIE game, Coach Dana Altman sent him in for 25 minutes.

"We planned on 15-20 minutes," Altman said after Saturday's game. "But he said he was feeling good, so we let him play."

Zeigler said playing with the wrap on his right hand wasn't a big problem.

"I felt no pain at all out there," Zeigler said. "However, I'm still not up there where I want to be. I had some problems with shooting the ball, but with the time, I got used to the brace."

Zeigler had no trouble bringing the ball up the court and playing defense, dishing out six assists and getting three steals while committing just one turnover.

"It was good to see him play out there," Altman said. "Marcus did a good job in directing. With him, we had a better motion of the ball in our offense."

With this performance, Zeigler earned his second start of the season against Wichita State Wednesday night.

Zeigler, who played 34 minutes, said he was satisfied with his performance, but there was still something missing.

"I'm not 100-percent yet with my hand," he said. "I still have to get the final touch back. But as far as dribbling and catching the ball, I have no problems."

Altman was pleased about how things turned out for Zeigler.

"I think it's pretty obvious we're a different basketball team with him on the floor," Altman said. "He gives us a little composure, makes it tougher for the other team to press us. I think he hasn't played as well tonight as he has been playing, but maybe it's because he played 34 minutes.

"But he keeps us organized, keeps us together. And we're just a better team when he is on the floor right now."

INDOOR TRACK

Season begins today for thinclads

KRIS YOUNG
Collegian

If history repeats itself, the K-State indoor track team will open its season with an exciting meet today and Saturday in Ahearn Field House. In last year's opener, the men won eight events while the women took six.

The event is known as the Wildcat pentathlon-septathlon and the KSU quadrangular. The Wildcats will host Oklahoma State, Southwest Missouri State and Toledo.

Gwen Wentland and Kathy Janicke will compete in the pentathlon and Troy Adkins and Jason Meredith will represent K-State in the septathlon, said track coach John Capriotti.

In last year's pentathlon, Wentland, a freshman at the time, won with a new meet record of 3,441 points.

Capriotti said he uses the meet to find out the progress and fitness of his team.

"It's our first meet of the year. We're trying to find out where everyone is as far as fitness level," Capriotti said.

However, he also stresses the importance of giving the athletes time to get back into the swing of things.

"We have to give them time to get back into it. They are just getting back to school and training," he said, "This is a low key meet and as weeks go by, meets will get more important."

Capriotti said most of the team will be competing in the quadrangular. One noticeable absence will be Janet Haskin, a three-time all-American in cross country, indoor and outdoor track.

"We won't have Haskin back. She's coming off an injury and I don't know if we'll ever have her back," Capriotti said.

All-Americans returning from the 1991 indoor season are Clifton Etheridge, triple jump; Thomas Randolph, 55-meter dash; and Markeya Jones, 200-meter dash. Jones and Randolph will compete this weekend.

The meet is a non-scoring meet, meaning team scores won't be kept. Capriotti said it is great preparation for the first scoring meet, a Jan. 25 triangular in Columbia, Mo., with Missouri and Kansas.

CLUB SPORTS

Hockey team looks to avenge losses

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

The big day has arrived.

When the skaters of the K-State hockey team step on the ice this weekend to play consecutive matches against Missouri, it will be for the first time as a Central College Hockey Association Division II team.

K-State will meet the Tigers Saturday and Sunday at 4 p.m. in Columbia, Mo.

But for the Wildcats, who will start with goalie Bill Hudson, defense players Jake Kisel and Tony DiCola, and Yuichiro Namba, Kevin Rodewald and Pat Steiner in the offensive line, it's not a scary debut.

"We are really anxious to play," team captain DiCola said. "We're excited about it."

Missouri was the only opponent K-State faced in the fall season. The Tigers won both games. Since then, Missouri established itself as a leading team in the division by beating Washington-St. Louis and Logan, the two top teams in the CCHA.

"We know what to expect from them," Kisel said. "It will be a physical, hard-hitting game."

"I don't see a lot of changes in the game from the last time we played them," DiCola said. "The only thing that will be different is that they have four new players we haven't seen yet."

Otherwise, K-State hopes to reverse the outcome of the fall games. The team has watched tapes of the previous games and talked about game situations. Now, they know what led to the losses.

"We had a lot of defensive letdowns in the first games," DiCola said. "We have to improve our defensive play with a better backchecking. We need to attack the offensive players earlier. That's the key for us in the games. If we keep them under 20 shots, we're in good shape."

One problem for the Cats' offensive line will be Missouri's goalkeeper.

"They have an outstanding goalie," Kisel said. "It's hard to just skate down and shoot. We have to make quicker passes, quicker shots against this guy."

SPORTS COLUMN

Realistically, the Cats will not win the Big Eight this year

DAVID SVOBODA

Hype.

It's a fairly normal thing this time of year, with the Super Bowl on the horizon.

And another entity that generates quite a bit of hot air this time of the year is college basketball. Every team in the country with an above-.500 record prior to conference play is laying claim to a league title right about now.

Some are making legitimate claims. Others have no right hogging paper and videotape with ideas no more legitimate than a pro-wrestling match.

Unfortunately, it would seem that a few folks in these parts are making claims they would apparently — at least of late — have no business in making.

The K-State men's basketball team will not win the Big Eight title this year, a year in which the conference may be the toughest in the nation. Take this one to the bank, regardless of what Wildcat players might tell you.

That statement contains quite a bit of sting, but it's only realistic, based on the on-court performance of the team in the last month.

Oklahoma State 72, K-State 34. Nothing more needs to be said.

In early-season home blowout victories, this group of Wildcats showed signs of being the best team to wear the purple and white since the Final Eight unit of 1987-88. Now, however, this team appears no better than the 1989-90 group that made the NCAA Tourney virtually by nature of the school's reputation as a basketball power alone.

And, at times, this Jekyll and Hyde team has looked no better than last year's crew, which finished its year looking up at seven other teams at the end of league play.

Several questions regarding Coach Dana Altman's 1991-92 team have been posed on talk shows in these parts lately, and they are questions, for the most part, that remain largely unanswered.

The first is whether or not Altman can coach at this level.

Known as a fantastic recruiter, Altman has come under fire of late because his team hasn't won consistently since his arrival as Lon Kruger's replacement. Altman, the critics say, doesn't have the ability to pull a game out of a fire late that Kruger did.

Altman, as ridiculous as it seems, has even been compared to former Wildcat football coach Stan Parrish. "He was a proven winner at a lower level, and he might be able to recruit, but he just can't win against the big boys." Or so the party line goes.

Few coaches ever to work the sidelines in Manhattan had Kruger's moxie. That can't be debated. But Altman's record as a proven junior college winner would appear to indicate that he's up to the challenges presented him here.

Give Altman time. After all, fans in these parts almost ran a guy named Tex Winter out of here at one point, and now he's in the K-State Sports Hall of Fame. And no, this is not to say Altman is Winter. But it is to say that he deserves the chance to prove that he's not the heel many make him out to be.

The focal point of many of the questions and criticisms — and rightfully so — has been the team itself. Many players on this squad came to Manhattan with trumpets blaring their arrival, and the notes they've played lately have been a bit sour.

In the backcourt, the team is still missing the kind of leadership — or even something approaching it — that Steve Henson provided during his four years here. This team will be much, much better when Brian Henson returns to play, which may be as early as Saturday's game against Oklahoma.

Henson the younger and Marcus Zeigler give K-State a tandem at point guard that allows Altman to use Vincent Jackson and Gaylon Nickerson, both failures in early point guard experiments, solely at the shooting guard slot.

Nickerson and Jackson give the Wildcats a pair of potentially explosive players at the two spot, but the explosions thus far have been few and far between. One can only hope that Jackson will settle down completely now that he's not likely to be jumping back and forth from slot to slot.

Down low, Altman appears comfortable now with a trio of Askia Jones, Wylie Howard and Aaron Collier working along the baseline. Jones is the team's new go-to guy, and Howard and Collier appear to be players cut in the same mold as were the Fred McCoys and Charles Bledsoes of days gone by.

But beyond the six frontline players previously mentioned, only Deryl Cunningham and Trasel Rone appear to have opportunities to be legitimate impact players.

Rone could be the big key here.

If he reaches the potential Altman obviously felt he would last spring, when the K-State coach fretted over a story that almost scared Rone away from coming to K-State, the Cats will have a group that on paper is as talented as the unit that started Steve Henson, Will Scott, Ron Meyer, Mitch Richmond and Charles Bledsoe, and had Fred McCoy and Mark Dobbins providing spark from the bench.

But being strong on paper doesn't win ballgames. People do, teams do. And this unit has too many questions to answer to expect that another conference championship banner will be hanging from the Bramlage rafters when the 1992-93 season opens in November.

This team can still achieve the NCAA tourney berth that many, including I, felt it would achieve just over a month ago. But it's got quite a bit of work ahead of it to get there. That work begins Saturday. A win over OU would be a nice start.

Team battles rigors of "Champ Camp"

ERIC BROWN
Collegian

Christmas break is traditionally a time for college students to lay around, sleep late and eat leftover holiday goodies.

But not for the K-State baseball team, whose players start the year out right by building their own tradition of marathon dawn-to-dusk workouts — an event they've come to know and respect as "Champ Camp."

This is the third year for the program and it has been met with great results.

"We've been going for three years now," coach Mike Clark said. "After the first year, we revamped it some and after last year we revamped it a little more.

"We seemed to peak early the last two years, so we've made this a little less grueling and added more of a focus on the mental aspects."

Champ Camp ended Tuesday after a week-long run. The workouts ran from 9 a.m. to 9:30 p.m in Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

The camp started as a preseason conditioning program, but has evolved into a virtual necessity due to new NCAA legislation, Clark said. The rule allows only 20 hours of practice each week, but practices during the semester break or any other time school is not in session are not restricted.

As Clark pointed out, the 20 alotted hours doesn't allow the three coaches enough time to work on an individual basis with the 36 players. Individual instruction is something that can be concentrated on during this week.

"We work on a lot of the little things now so we can work on the big things later," Clark said. "We can use the spring practices to work on hitting, fielding and throwing and we won't have to worry about teaching things like bunt coverage, defenses and pick-off plays."

Although the camp has toned down from years past when it was a death camp-type atmosphere, it still gets the attention of the players.

"We had some tough workouts the first few days to show them how important it is to be in shape, but we haven't been overly demanding since then," Clark said.

The week gets the season off to a good start by creating a close atmosphere and instilling a strong work ethic.

"They come in here on their own and pay for most of their meals and really work hard," Clark said. "They end up spending a lot of time together — there really isn't a lot going on in Manhattan the week before classes start."

Clark was upbeat about the camp's final day.

"They've worked real hard, we're where we want to be and we accomplished everything that we had wanted to accomplish," Clark said.

He added that on the last night, they rented a movie and had an easy night.

Hockey

"Our defensive players also have to get involved into the offense," DiCola added. "They have to shoot from the blue line through the crowd in front of the goalie to make it difficult for him to see the puck. We have to shoot low, that's the best opportunity to score."

Another important part on the team's way to a win against the Tigers is to keep penalties to a minimum. In the second game against Missouri last fall, K-State suffered 30 penalty minutes which is equivalent to having one less player on the ice for an entire half.

If the team can accomplish those things during the games, DiCola said, K-State should return to Manhattan with two wins.

"We're at full strength," he said. "Besides the knee injury of one goalie, all injuries have healed over the break. We're fired up to play again."

Zeigler

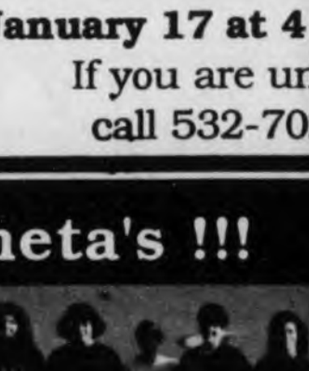
the Shockers, Zeigler even pulled off the brace.

"I felt uncomfortable with it," he said. "It was squeezing my hand. I just got tired of it and took it off, but I didn't feel problems then with the hand at all."

Playing painless gives Zeigler the hope to be totally fit in less than two weeks.



"I'm supposed to see the doctor in two weeks," he said. "Other than that, I just visit with trainer Troy (Maurer) and put a lot of ice on the hand."

MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. DAY

1991 "Year of the Black Film"

LISA EDMUNDS

Critics and audiences are calling 1991 "The Year of the Black Film."

Young filmmakers like Spike Lee, John Singleton, Mario Van Peebles and others are bringing stories of black America to the forefront in Hollywood and in theaters across America.

With "New Jack City," "Jungle Fever" and "Boyz N the Hood" drawing critical acclaim and mainstream audiences, black film is in the spotlight right now. Considering the youth and increasing power of these young directors, this wave of attention and expression is likely to continue.

We've come a long way, baby, since the days of "Shaft" and the black exploitation films of the 1970s, when black actors were pigeon-holed into roles as waiters, pimps and criminals — even further from the early days of film when black roles were played by whites in dark face.

Hollywood and black America have affected each other and responded to each other in curious and confusing fashion since the birth of the film industry. In fact, even back in those "good old days" when the racist and even inflammatory depiction of blacks on film was at its very worst, Hollywood has had an impact on African-Americans.

Public reaction to racist themes and portrayals in D.W. Griffith's "Birth of a Nation" helped rally the black community into protest groups, which eventually formed the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

If the early days of blatant stereotypes and racist themes represent the worst of the bad and ugly of relations between white Hollywood and black America, this new spotlight on black filmmakers and the stories of black Americans at least offers hope of improved relations and more responsible representations.

On the most superficial level, the audience might perceive that films like "New Jack City" and Lee's "Do the Right Thing" are shining examples of the new and improved, multicultural world of Hollywood. And on the most basic level, these films do represent some progress.

The films did make it into general distribution, which is an improvement of large measure. On some levels, black film has been accepted into the mainstream.

A second look at the general response to films like the summer's "Boyz N the Hood" or the earlier "Do the Right Thing" tells another story. With violent, gang-oriented films such as "Colors," "New Jack City" and others, press reports of isolated movie-related violence — shootings, protests at the theaters, etc. — grabbed bigger headlines than the reviews or box office receipts.

The media predicted "Do the Right Thing" would inspire riots and terror in the streets.

When a woman and a man got into an altercation at a screening of Eddie Murphy's "Raw," which did lead to a shooting, the naysayers and vultures of the media attributed the violence to black people, because Murphy and the couple involved were all black.

Does the media blame and indict Sylvester Stallone and all white people for every psycho who drapes himself in Rambo-style assault gear and opens fire on a bank, a schoolyard of youngsters or diners in a crowded restaurant? No. Shall we allow men left by their wives in recent months the opportunity to name "Thelma and Louise" as co-respondents in divorce court? No.

Yet, as long as black Americans are seen as a threat to the dominant culture — physical, economic or whatever — we will never make great inroads in race relations, to say nothing of cross-cultural art. Spike Lee will remain only a "black" filmmaker, instead of an "American" filmmaker.

In the end, the vote is split on the state of black film in the 1990s. For the artists and efforts elements of "white" Hollywood who are finally bringing multicultural stories to the screen, I'd give them two thumbs up.

For huge portions of the media and the audience — the people who make it possible for guys like David Duke and racist hate groups to operate — it's an emphatic thumbs down.

MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. DAY

Walk, vigil kick off King holiday

BRIAN KRATZER
Collegian

People walking through campus singing and holding candles will kick off a week of activities honoring the late civil liberties leader Martin Luther King Jr.

The Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial walk will begin at 6:30 Monday night in front of Waters Hall and end at All Faiths Chapel. After the walk, Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity will have a vigil and religious service in All Faiths.

"The walk starts a kickoff for the campus," Veryl Switzer, Martin Luther King Jr. Observance chairman, said.

William Coleman, Alpha Phi Alpha parliamentarian, said the fraternity was involved with the walk because King was an Alpha Phi Alpha.

"He was a brother of ours who we cared about and looked up to," Coleman said. "We want people to understand his fights and his struggles.

"The event helps us realize that Martin Luther King did have dreams, and we must go beyond his dreams and fulfill new dreams for the new generations," Coleman said. "People can come and remember the reasons we're here."

Reginald McGallon, adviser for the fraternity, said the committee in charge of the event is made up of four Alpha Phi Alpha members.

"We mapped out the program and asked people to participate," McGallon said.

"We asked the presidents of the Black Student Union, K-State Panhellenic Council and other speakers on behalf of Martin Luther King to speak about his work and what a good day this will be," McGallon said.

Some of the speakers include Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, Shanta Bailey, BSU president and Lavario Richardson, Panhellenic president.

EL SALVADOR

Peace after 12 years of civil war

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Workers got the day off, church bells pealed and technicians wired downtown plazas for sound Thursday in preparation for rival block parties celebrating the arrival of peace.

Much of this small Central American nation was glued to radios or TV sets at midday, witnessing long-distance the signing in Mexico City of a treaty ending 12 years of civil war.

By mid-afternoon, tens of thousands were gathered in or heading toward the central Plaza Civica or Plaza Libertad. The guerrilla Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, and leftist organizations had called supporters to the former.

The rightist government of Alfredo Cristiani, who took part in the treaty signing in Mexico, summoned its followers to Plaza Libertad to welcome home "the president of peace" Thursday night and dance until dawn.

Though separated by only 100 yards of pavement, the two plazas were worlds apart. The figurative chasm underscored the magnitude of the task of reconciliation awaiting the country.

The conflict killed at least 75,000 people, wounded twice that number and laid waste to much of the nation's productive infrastructure.

By afternoon, the Plaza Civica was jammed with leftists, among them hundreds of guerrilla combatants who'd left their guns and fatigues in the hills.

German Serrano and Douglas Santamaria, insurgent commanders who had slipped into the city from the fronts, addressed the crowd to raucous applause. Several urban guerrilla chiefs were also on hand.

The facades of the National Cathedral and the National Palace bordering the square were ablaze with banners and flags hailing the insurgent army.

"Our rifles are the guarantee of the campesinos' land," said one banner. A 45-by-20 foot canvas was painted with a dove, a rainbow and a huge portrait of Farabundo Marti, a Communist who led an uprising here in 1932. It was a bloody failure.

The cathedral and palace are both unoccupied. The palace was severely damaged in a 1986 earthquake; the cathedral has been under construction for years.

Red flags were as abundant as white ones — for peace — or blue-and-white national banners in the Plaza Civica. Loudspeakers on a stage erected in front of the palace piped out a hymn that went "Peace, peace, peace, the world wants peace." But the MCs alternated that with revolutionary songs calling for "liberation."

In mid-plaza, 19th-century hero Gerardo Barrios, namesake of the military academy, sat high on his metal horse, a red flag emblazoned "FMLN" raised incongruously in his hand.

At the moment Cristiani signed the accord, the plaza broke out in a thunderous cheer, and celebrants hugged each other. Tears welled in many an eye. Firecrackers popped, and Beethoven's Ode to Joy blared from the speakers.

"President Cristiani, peace was achieved thanks to your efforts," read a long banner in the heart of the square.

GRADING

Senates examine grading system

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

Committees in Faculty and Student Senate are examining changes in the grading system.

Ann Woodbury, Student Senate Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee chairwoman, said while her committee's priority will be creating a minors program, the issue of grades will be one of the issues it faces this spring.

"The first step is that the committee will decide what issues to research. Our main priority is to propose a plan for a minors program, but the issue of changing the grading system of course will be one of them. We will discuss in committee and try to get a way to get student input," said Woodbury, a junior in sociology and anthropology.

The academic affairs committee of Faculty Senate also formed subcommittees before Christmas break to research a plus and plus/minus system.

"The reason we have begun looking into the issues is that several people have expressed concern and we try to look into what Student Senate is also considering," said Linda Thurston, professor of special education and chairwoman of academic affairs committee.

Carol Schoenbachler, junior in speech, focused her persuasive speech on various grading systems and in November she took her findings to an open period at Student Senate.

Schoenbachler said she was in favor of adopting a plus system, but also gave information on a plus/minus and the present systems.

"I felt very strongly way before this became an assignment," Schoenbachler said. "I attended Michigan State, which uses the plus system, before I came to K-State.

"While the plus/minus system is set up on a .7 and .3 scale there are not as many options on the plus system. The plus is right in between with a .5 grading system."

The current system K-State uses is a straight system of letter grades. The plus system allows the addition of pluses with grades, and the plus/minus system would include minus and plus grades.

"The most common grading system is the current system of straight-letter grades of A, B, C, D," Registrar Donald Foster said. "There are a number of institutions with a plus system and there seems to be some growth in utilizing that system.

"The real rationale is that people who get an 89 and an 80 percent both get B's and that that is a widespread margin. Percentage-wise it really isn't. It would be pretty difficult for faculty to discriminate between a student receiving a B- or a C+."

Many student senators are interested in the different options of grading students' performance.

"I didn't realize there was a plus/minus system. When I came to college I took it for granted and was shocked to know that there were many colleges that did their grading differently," Woodbury said.

Big Eight universities using the straight grading system include Oklahoma State, University of Kansas, University of Oklahoma and the University of Missouri. The University of Nebraska has a plus system and Iowa State, University of Colorado and KU utilize the plus/minus system, Schoenbachler said.

KU has both a straight grading system and a plus/minus system, with various colleges specifying the type of system they use.

Foster said although students think a plus and minus system would enhance their grades, it could have the reverse effect.

"Grade point averages might go down," Foster said. "A student receiving a straight A before could get an A- instead. The new system would probably help the middle-of-the-road students more than the students receiving A's."

The addition of pluses and minus could reward students for their extra effort in classes.

"The A, B, C, D, is not specific enough. From my own experience there are a number of students that receive B's but could be getting a B+ or a B- or a C+. The present grading system doesn't reflect that," said Phil Anderson, instructor of speech. "If it adds a little more work, I think the added benefit to students will be worth it."

Due to lengthy research and consideration needed by both Student and Faculty senates, the grading system has not undergone many changes.

In the Faculty Senate academic affairs committee, one or more of the colleges will have to bring up a proposal to consider changing the present system before it is put on the Faculty Senate agenda or by a second option.

"There always is the possibility, if someone wants us to initiate a new idea, that we can every once in a while," Thurston said. "If someone comes to us or the committee and says we need to look into this we might look into it ourselves, especially if it is a concern of the entire University.

"The next step after we have done the research is to take a proposal to (Faculty Senate executive committee). That takes a long time for a proposal to pass, and any changes of credit hours and any changes in courses must go through us. There are many people that need to have enough information to make a decision."

ATHLETICS

Season-ticket holders can save money on new parking permits

JULIE LONG
Collegian

Athletic-season-ticket holders can save up to $9 on parking this season by purchasing a parking permit for basketball games.

The new general season parking permit can be purchased from the K-State Police for $45. This cost is compared to the $54 a ticket holder would pay during the season if he or she paid $3 at the gate before every game.

Dwain Archer, assistant manager of University Parking Services, said the permit was offered to allow easier accessibility.

"The seasonal basketball/football parking pass was introduced as a result of a successful survey conducted by University Parking Services over the summer of 1991," Archer said.

Surveys were sent to 1,500 season-ticket holders with about 50 percent of the surveys being returned, he said.

The responses on the surveys were overwhelmingly positive.

Archer said the permits were being used on a trial basis during the current basketball season. The permits will be offered again next year for both football and basketball if they work well this season.

Archer said he thought the time had come for the new permit.

"We recognized the fact that a lot of patrons would like to buy a discounted pass," Archer said.

He also said the permits were designed as a price break for students.

Switching to designated pass gates is something else Archer said he would like to do in the future. Currently, gate No. 1 is for passes only. Gate No. 2 is an exit-only gate. Gates 3, 4, 5, 7 and 8 are all general admission.

Students who work the parking lot gates said they thought the passes were a good idea.

Laurie McMinn, freshman in animal sciences and industry, said a lot of people had gone through with the permits. She said she thought both season-ticket-holders and students working the gates liked the season permits.

"It's really convenient because they can drive on through," McMinn said.

Kelly Stewart, senior in sociology, said the new permits sped things along. He said having to pay at the gate backed up traffic.

A/Pass/F grade option available for 11 years

Students use system to boost GPAs not broaden education, registrar says

MARGO KELLER
Collegian

The letter-grade system currently used to figure a student's grade point average has been in effect for more than 40 years, University Registrar Donald Foster said.

Modifications on the various policies of the system occur on the average of only once every seven years, making the grading system stable in comparison to frequent changes in various college curriculum requirements.

The option of allowing classes to be taken as an A/Pass/F option was passed through a process that any new proposal would have to take. In order for a policy like this to be passed, a recommendation from the Student Senate Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee would be taken to Student Senate.

If the student senators decide the issue is worthy of further consideration, the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee will look over the proposal and pass it on to Faculty Senate for final approval.

According to a Jan. 20, 1981 Collegian article, the option was passed by Faculty Senate in 1979 as an alternative to the credit-no credit alternative.

The A/Pass/F system as listed in the General Catalog is an alternative grading option where an A grade is recorded as an A, but a grade of B, C, or D will be recorded as a Pass and a grade of F will be recorded as an F.

In the Fall of 1990, of 95,228 grades given only 53 were grades with the 'P', passing option only. Statistics were not able to reflect the number of A and F grades from the A/Pass/F option, said Bill Pallett, director of evaluation.

"Even if there are a couple hundred students taking this grading option, that's probably still only one-tenth of a percent," Pallett said.

The Spring 1991 grades also reflected this trend, with only 55 passing-grade-option grades in light of 86,035 grades given.

Foster said the option is more accessible to students in upper-level classes and colleges with general electives. He said the Colleges of Engineering and Architecture and Design have few classes that can be taken on this basis.

No statistics are tabulated on the total number of students enrolled each semester in the option, but 85 pass grades were given in Fall 1991. Students can add the option through drop/add until January 24, or until March 27 for courses which meet during the second half of the semester.

Charlotte Pfaff, records supervisor, said instructors are unaware of students who have requested the A/Pass/F option. When the instructors hand in the final grade sheets, the computer will transfer letter grades to the pass grade if they are either a B, C or D.

"Based on the numbers, it really is not doing what it was intended to do," Foster said. "I think students are using it is to boost their GPAs instead of broadening their education."

The general catalog also notes that first-semester freshman and students on probation may not take this option, although Freshman Seminar class is one class that uses this grading option only.

"I don't think it is mentioned much unless a student reads about it and inquires about it," said Judy Lynch, associate director for the Academic Assistance Center. "I feel it is a real valuable option since students can take a class not in their curriculum and really explore it and not fear that they are not doing well in it. Some Another excellent photo is that of the "Unknown Couple." Not only is it unknown who they are, but it is questionable how old they are. At first glance, it would appear they are elderly, but upon further examination, it reveals they are not. Age has come not in the form of years, but in a hard, but also well-lived life.

Every photo has a personality of its own, just like the people.

Don't be intimidated by the fact that the photos are amidst desks and filing cabinets — the staff members don't mind viewers wandering around the offices. And the view is well worth the hassle.

The three main requirements of the option are listed in the general catalog. Any free elective course, which is a course that is not specified in their chosen curriculum, can qualify. Courses specified by name or number and general-distribution requirements courses are not considered free electives. A general-distribution requirement must be in the upper-division level of 300 or higher and be a course required by name or number that is part of the student's degree program.

Pass hours can only be taken for only one-sixth of the total hours needed for a bachelor's degree. To sign up for the option students must obtain a signature from their adviser and are eligible during the third and fourth weeks of each regular semester.

TALENT AUDITIONS FOR SINGERS • DANCERS

This could be the start of something big! Worlds of Fun is searching for the Midwest's most talented singers and dancers to appear in our 1992 show program. Performing at Worlds of Fun is the perfect summer job for students. If you work the entire season (six days per week in the summer, and weekends in the spring and fall) you can earn over $6,300 in wages and bonuses. And, this year

We will offer more Summer only jobs (late May through late August) than ever before!

"All The Worlds A Stage" at Worlds of Fun, from our lively 50's-60's rock revue, STAX OF WAX, to our spectacular new musical production at the Tivoli Music Hall. Performing at Worlds of Fun is fun. And it can be that important First Step. More than 1,300,000 Worlds of Fun visitors are waiting to discover YOU!!

AUDITION INSTRUCTIONS:
If you are a singer, please sing one verse and the chorus of two contrasting styles of song; one up-tempo and one ballad. Sing any type of music you enjoy; rock, gospel, show tunes, etc. (no rap) If you are a dancer, please prepare a jazz routine. Please limit your material to no more than three minutes in length. (No jobs are available for dramatic actors or instrumentalists).

You must provide your own accompaniment, whether it be a pianist or a cassette tape. We will provide a cassette deck and a piano.

Critics resisting change, Yeltsin says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin, caught in a maelstrom over economic reforms, berated his critics Thursday for resisting change and said the Russian people were taking the hardships better than lawmakers.

Two weeks after Russia lifted most price controls in a drastic attempt to start conversion to a market economy, the shelves of most food stores were bare and buyers could barely afford what was left.

Leaders of the Commonwealth of Independent States on Thursday focused on military issues dividing the young association.

The Tass news agency reported that decisions had been put off until February, although they signed an unspecified joint statement on military issues.

Tass quoted Yeltsin spokesman Pavel Voshchanov as saying that the leaders approved an oath of allegiance for servicemen of the strategic forces of the commonwealth.

But former republics that want to form their own armies apparently could not agree to a common oath for their forces, Tass said. Those republics include Ukraine, Moldova and Azerbaijan.

The commonwealth also formed a commission to decide how to divide the Black Sea Fleet between Russia and Ukraine, Tass said. A similar commission was formed on the Caspian Sea Fleet, made up of representatives of Russia and Azerbaijan, it said.

A group of 5,000 military officers planned to meet Friday to try to keep the 3.7 million-man former Soviet military united.

Earlier Thursday, Yeltsin told the Russian legislature that citizens have taken the reforms courageously.

"It is simply blasphemous at this point to speculate over the difficulties connected with the first step of the reform for the sake of petty political aims," Yeltsin said. "The reform isn't irreversible yet, and it won't be very difficult to wreck it."

Conservatives and some officials in the Russian leadership, including Vice President Alexander Rutskoi and parliament speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov, have criticized Yeltsin for raising prices without breaking up the old system of state-run industries and shops.

That criticism was echoed by economist Abel Aganbegyan, who gained wide regard as one of the first Soviet officials to push for a market economy.

"I fear that every month of delay in making real changes puts off the settlement of the crisis until 1993," Aganbegyan told the newspaper Exchange News, according to Tass.

Aganbegyan said Russia must reform its banking system and control the monetary supply before economic health will take hold.

Apparently trying to defuse the criticism, Yeltsin acknowledged troubles with price and privatization reforms, and blamed everybody from nationalists and black marketeers to bureaucrats and ex-Communists.

Store and factory directors continue to wait for directives from the top, and even when they receive them, they're not in too big a hurry to implement them, he said.

He alleged that resistance to reform was coming from the Mafia structures who are striving to preserve their dominant position in the sphere of distribution, and from the open sabotage and ideological confrontation on the side of the former party elite.

legislation to rescind the law because it was created to offset the cost of an extended unemployment bill, he said.

"This is a bill that saves money, and Congress will be hard pressed to vote against a cost saving measure. Unless they hear from students, they will assume there is no concern," he said.

And students should be concerned, because they are not the only ones who can damage their own credit rating. Moeder mentioned one such student whose ex-husband ran up bad credit before they were divorced. That is now reflected on her credit.

And, as it stands, the law is inclusive — it looks at an applicant's credit history from when it was first established.
